PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-FIFTH CONGRESS SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 10, 1918.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O God, as we come to meet the tasks of this day we look first to Thee for Thy guiding hand. Amid the confusion and violence of the world we dare not face our tremendous responsibilities and the tremendous interests without Thee. We need that wisdom which cometh from above, which is first pure, then peaceable, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruit, without partiality and without hypocrisy. We need the Divine program in our plans. We need the equipment of patience and courage and unselfish devotion to the calls of duty.

O God, help us. Give us clean hearts and right spirits, and make our country a great power for pulling down the strongholds of iniquity and for building up the cause of righteousness. Have mercy upon our enemies who, before the world, have broken down Thine altars, forsaken Thy covenants, and turned aside from Thy statutes and from the Christ of Bethlehem, and have set up the god of war and frightfulness. O God, lead them to see the error of their ways and to turn back to the Christ of God through repentance in Jesus' name. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REGENT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, caused by the death of Hon. William J. Stone, a Senator from the State of Missouri, the Chair, as authorized by law, appoints Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS, a Senator from the State of Colorado, to fill the vacancy.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have been furnished with a copy of the balance sheet showing the financial condition of the Aviation Section up to April 30, 1918, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD for the information of the Senate and public.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have also a copy of an official document issued by the war cabinet of Great Britain, being a report on aviation for the year 1917. This report indicates that we are not the only Nation engaged in this war that is having trouble with an aviation program. For the information of the Senate I ask leave to have this document printed in the RECORD also.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[The war cabinet report for the year 1917, presented to Parliament by command of His Majesty.]

SUPPLY OF AIRCRAFT.

The above recital indicates generally what steps have been taken in matters of administration and control. It should be supplemented by some general account of the measures taken as regards supply of aircraft and the development of that supply.

In endeavoring to describe the measures taken to meet the aircraft needs of the navy and army, the writer is at once confronted by the fact that the information desired by the country is precisely the information desired by the enemy. What the country wants to know is what has been the expansion in our air services; whether we have met and are meeting all the demands of the navy and of the army, both for replacement of obsolete machines by the most modern types and for the increase of our fighting strength in the air; what proportion of the national resources in men, material, and factories is being devoted to aviation; what the expansion is likely to be in the future. These are precisely the facts which we should like to know with regard to the German air service, and for that reason it would be inadmissible for us to supply Germany with corresponding information about ourselves by publishing a statement on the subject.

It can be said that the expansion of our air services is keeping pace generally with the growing needs of the navy and the army.

The brilliant part played by the Royal Flying Corps and the Royal Naval Air Service in the battles of the Somme, Vimy, Messines, and Ypres has been described by the commander in chief, who has also borne frequent testimony to the inestimable value of the work performed daily and nightly by the two air services. It is fair to say that not even the well-known superiority of our airmen over those of the enemy would have enabled them to have earned the commander in chief's praise in so unstinted a measure unless they had been supplied with satisfactory machines and equipment from home. It is rather the fashion to criticize the quality of our machines. Most of the critics, however, are ignorant of the technical and manufacturing difficulties which have to be overcome in order to keep up a constant and increasing supply of the most up-to-date machines. Not only are the technical difficulties and the resultant research and experimental work formidable in themselves, but the task of building up in war time, without seriously affecting the requirements of other services, a new industry of a most highly skilled character necessarily puts a heavy strain upon the organizing and manufacturing ability of the country. The growing realization of the increasing importance of aviation as an artificer of victory has recently been reflected by the concession of first priority to labor and materials required for aircraft production.

The nature of the duties performed by the Royal Naval Air Service, both in conjunction with the fleet and from naval bases, makes secrecy essential to success. It is, unfortunately, inevitable, therefore, that the public should remain in the dark on this subject; but the Germans, who in this matter are perhaps the best judges, have good reason to know and to regret the great and growing activities of the Royal Naval Air Service. All that has been said regarding the difficulties of supplying the requirements of the air forces operating over the land applies equally to the supply of those which operate over the sea. In both cases difficulties are being overcome, and the outlook is improving.

The science of aeronautics is in a state of constant and rapid development; improvements in engines, aeroplanes and their numerous accessories are constantly being worked out. But the interval between the discovery of an improvement and its introduction into the service is, owing to technical considerations, very much longer than is commonly supposed. Experience shows that, as a rule, from the date of the conception and design of an aeroengine to the delivery of the first engine in series by the manufacturer more than a year elapses; the corresponding period for an aeroplane is about one-half as long. Consequently plans have to be laid for a long period ahead, and these plans are liable to be upset by many uncertain factors. The hopes based upon the promising results given by the first experimental engines of a new design are frequently disappointed owing to difficulties of bulk manufacture or to defects only developed after long trial in the air; new types of aeroplanes favorably reported on when first tried are found on longer experience not to give complete satisfaction, and yet it is impossible, if we are to keep ahead in the keen struggle for aerial superiority, to wait for full experience before placing orders. Risks must be run, and new types must be adopted at the earliest moment consistent with reasonable assurance that they will constitute a substantial improvement on what is already in use. Orders must be placed, moreover, for considerable numbers and for delivery over many months, as the large output required for our present flying services can only be obtained by bulk orders permitting a high degree of subdivision of work.

The next step in the problem is the balancing of the engine and the aeroplane programs. Owing to the much longer period required for the production of engines than of aeroplanes, orders for the former must be placed for relatively long periods ahead, before it is known what types of aeroplanes will be required when the engines become available.

The problem is complicated by the fact that manufacture and delivery rarely, if ever, proceed in accordance with anticipation. The output of a particular type may be delayed for weeks or even months owing to some technical difficulty of manufacture. Moreover, as replacement of losses and expansion are proceeding simultaneously in the flying services, and the rate of wastage in different types of engines and of aeroplanes varies considerably according to circumstances, it is impossible to forecast with accuracy what engines will be available for the equipment of new types of aeroplanes after wastage has been made good. Nor is it possible to any great extent to adjust the program by modifying orders once placed without disorganizing supply. The problem does not end here. Whenever a new type is introduced provision must be made for accumulating a sufficient "head" of spare engines, spare aeroplanes, and spare parts of innumerable kinds, to keep the squadron to be equipped with that type in a condition to make good the day-to-day wastage and carry out the constant repairs required.

Such being the nature of the problem, it is satisfactory to be able to record that during the year 1917 not only was the number of squadrons of aircraft on the various fronts increased in a notable degree, but there was a complete replacement of machines and engines of the older types. The very great increase in output which is being obtained has placed a considerable strain on the workers in the aircraft and aeroengine factories of the country, a strain which is being met on the whole in a satisfactory manner.

The difficulties in connection with production are aggravated by the competing claims of many different types of aeroengines Standardization is the ideal, but it is obviously difficult of attainment, having in view the importance of not losing time in production and at the same time of keeping abreast with the very latest developments necessitated by the need for constant increase of horsepower and higher performance. The air council are most keenly impressed by the need for concentration on a few approved engines, and they have the whole question of the reduction of numbers of types under constant and careful consideration.

Attention was drawn on more than one occasion by manufacturers to the importance of maintaining the interest of workers in aircraft factories in the highly important but generally monotonous work on which they are employed. Engaged, as they frequently are, on the production by a repetition process of some small part of an aeroplane, these men and women find it difficult to realize that they are contributing effectively to one of our most valuable instruments of warfare. It was accordingly arranged that Capt. Ewart, R. F. A., well known as a writer by the name of "Boyd Cable," should visit various squadrons at the front and gather materials and photographs for lectures concerning the exploits performed with various types of aircraft for delivery to the workpeople engaged on the manufacture of those particular types. Capt. Ewart delivered several series of lectures which, judging from the reports received from the factories concerned, proved a very great success.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House recedes from its amendment to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 123) providing for the calling into military service of certain classes of persons registered and liable for military service under the terms of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

The message also announced that the House disagrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

The message further announced that the House further insists upon its amendments to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DENT, Mr. FIELDS, and Mr. KAHN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House has signed the enrolled bill (S. 3402) to fix the age limits for candidates for admission to the United States Naval Academy, and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HOLLIS. I present a telegram from the Central Labor Union of Portsmouth, N. H., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PORTSMOUTH, N. H., May 10, 1918.

Senator HENRY F. HOLLIS,
Washington, D. C.:

We take this means of protesting against the removal of the so-called antiefficiency rider in the naval appropriation bill. We also request that you use every effort in having it retained, and that you secure the same publicity for this telegram as Senator GALLINGER obtained for the opposition.

ROBERT V. NOBLE,
Secretary-Treasurer Portsmouth (N. H.) Central Labor Union.

Mr. CALDER. I present a resolution adopted by the Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce in opposition to the provision in the naval appropriation bill prohibiting the use of time-saving devices. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce, 127 Remsen Street.]

At a meeting of the committee on legislation of the Brooklyn Chamber of Commerce, held on May 7, 1918, at 5 p. m., pursuant to notice, the following resolution was unanimously adopted by the committee:

Resolved, That we oppose the provision of the naval appropriation bill reading as follows: "That no part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch or other time-measuring device a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premiums or bonuses or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant," upon the ground that in the present crisis it is absolutely necessary for the Government to accelerate naval construction by every possible means, and that in our judgment the adoption of the above-quoted provision would undoubtedly retard instead of accelerate such work.

We therefore believe that in the interests of patriotism and the prompt and successful prosecution of the war this provision should be eliminated from the naval appropriation bill.

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress from New York State be urged to vote against the adoption of the above-quoted provision and that a copy of this resolution be sent to the Senators and Representatives from Kings County.

Mr. SHIELDS. I present and ask to have printed in the RECORD a petition from some estimable gentlemen and ladies of Athens, Tenn., urging one of their Senators to vote for woman suffrage.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To Hon. JOHN K. SHIELDS,
Senator from Tennessee:

Realizing that we are not a democracy, since half our citizens are unenfranchised; and

Whereas the burdens of war fall as heavily upon the womanhood of our Nation as they do upon the manhood, and believing that those who bear a full share of the burdens of a nation in war as in peace should have a voice in the government which imposes those burdens; and

Whereas the United States has joined this great world's war for democracy and it is looked upon as the leader in all that is just and right, and believing that the enfranchisement of women in America will bring to our Nation a twofold strength in this great war; and

Whereas by the passage of the Susan B. Anthony amendment now in the Senate the bill can be passed to the States for ratification;

Therefore we, the undersigned, earnestly implore you to cast your vote for the amendment.

C. L. Hardwick, Mrs. Theodore E. Stivers, Dessie Chapman, R. B. Hurt, Charles Frost, Carl Grigsby, C. O. Brock, J. M. Carl, O. C. Ragsdale, E. E. Wells, Mrs. L. L. Woollen, L. L. Woollen, Mrs. H. E. Haggard, John C. Moore, E. S. Petty, Nell Payne, W. H. Wells, J. T. Huffin, May Fraker, Mrs. Carl Grigsby, Mrs. N. M. Haggard, Ada Fraker, H. E. Haggard, J. N. Taylor, E. T. Campbell, L. S. Yearson, J. J. Schultz, J. E. Helms.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Napa, Cal., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the congregation of the First Friends Church, of Pasadena, Cal., remonstrating against universal military training, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KNOX presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Easton, Pa., and a petition of the Westminster Presbytery, of Lancaster, Pa., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to prohibit polygamy, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE ALABAMA APARTMENT HOUSE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, a few days ago I presented a petition together with a letter in reference to the apartment house the Alabama. I left the name of the apartment house out, but the petition I presented did refer to it. That petition was sent to me with a letter by Hon. C. J. Blanchard, of the Reclamation Service.

I think day before yesterday I quoted in the RECORD an extract from a letter relating to this same apartment house. That letter was from Hon. W. P. Witton, former chief law clerk of the Land Office, a man whom I have known for a great many years and thoroughly reliable and responsible. I thought and still think I had a right to rely upon the statements he made. But in justice and fairness to the owners of the Alabama I ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter which I have received from them this morning in reference to the situation there. I also present a letter without the signature from a party who claims to know the conditions in reference to the matter of subletting in the Alabama and ask that it be printed. Assuming the statements made as correct in this letter, it indicates that the tenants are subletting to a very great exent, and that they are even greater profiteers than anyone else proposes to be. The bill which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has in charge, and which is before the Senate for consideration, will prevent the things mentioned in this letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

The communications referred to are as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 8, 1918.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR JONES: We have read in to-day's Washington Post a statement reported to have been made by you in the Senate on May 7 with reference to the Alabama apartment house, as follows:

"It is proposed," continued Senator JONES, "to raise the rent for apartments in this house, or under the guise of a sale, to throw all of the tenants out, including the families of the 27 men who are fighting on the battle front in France for liberties of the people of the whole country and of the District of Columbia, in order that some man may secure a little more money.

"Congress, if it can stop anything of that kind, ought to do it, and I believe it can. Although these people have been living there for from 8 to 13 years and their means of support in many instances are fighting on the battle line in Europe, the owner of this property must take advantage of conditions now to enrich himself at their expense. That is but one example of the kind in the city."

Before making such a statement it would seem fair and just that you should make some attempt to verify the facts in this case, especially since a true statement of the facts in the case would have shown that there is no basis for your conclusions. The facts in the case are as follows:

1. No proposal to raise the rents has been suggested by us or anyone authorized by us to any tenant in the Alabama.

2. There has been no proposal under the "guise of a sale" to throw all of the tenants out in order that we may accomplish the same end.

3. All of the leases in the Alabama apartment house are drawn to expire September 30, 1918, and no tenant could be dispossessed prior to the expiration of his lease, either by the present owners or any purchaser thereof.

4. The Alabama apartment house has been for sale for some time prior to the war, during which time we have had numbers of possible and probable purchasers who have been shown through the building from time to time. The idea of selling the apartment is not a new one by any means; it was built for sale. We will certainly be justified in making a sale to a bona fide purchaser.

We had every opportunity to raise the rents last October; we refrained from taking this action, although we were well aware that there would be a tremendous increase in the cost and upkeep of this building.

The questionable schemes to raise rents attributed to us are not supported by facts or reason. Your informants, if they made the statements attributed to them, falsely represented to you that we are proposing to raise the rents, and not believing this representation strong enough to move you to action, they charge, contrary to facts, that we tried under the "guise of a sale," to accomplish the same end. No reasonable person could believe that the sale of the property could put him in any better position to raise the rents, as a purchaser would have to face the same situation that now exists.

Are we to believe that such inflammatory statements without verification are to be the basis of legislation in Congress? Do you think it fair dealing to the citizens and property owners of the District to prejudge them without giving them the slightest show?

We are constrained to believe that the information communicated to you is but a fair sample of a large proportion of the communications, signed and unsigned, which have been made to the Members of Congress, and it is unfortunate that they should be acted upon and made the basis of legislation by Congress without the slightest effort at verification.

It would appear to us, that where so much was involved that at least you could have first verified the facts or given the opportunity to us to explain conditions before publicly branding us, in effect, frauds and profiteers.

We wish you would be good enough to correct the Senate record in accordance with the facts as given herewith. If there are any further facts which you would like to have in the matter, we will be only too glad to furnish them.

Very truly, yours,

BATES WARREN,
JOHN L. WARREN,
Owners of the Alabama Apartment House.

RECORD DIVISION, PENSION BUREAU,
Washington, May 8, 1918.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, City.

MY DEAR SENATOR: This account of the patriotic (?) and sorely abused (?) tenants of the Alabama has attracted my attention, because for the past six months I have been an interested observer of the conditions there.

One abused owner of an apartment rents a dark room lighted mostly by electricity to two enlisted men for $25 per month. He himself pays $35 per month for his entire apartment. I can not vouch for what he pays, but I can for what he gets. Ask this man what rent he got for his room up to June, 1917.

Three patriotic women and a child live in the dining room and kitchen of one apartment in order to sublet the other rooms at fancy prices. Not satisfied with doing this themselves, they are urging their next-door neighbor to raise the rent on the only room she sublets. However, the neighbor has her own idea as to how to run her own apartment. All honor to her. Let the agent learn how many people are living in that apartment, how many are occupying one room, what price each subtenant is paying now, and what price was received June, 1917. In fact, let him take each apartment in turn, ask "owner" of apartment and subtenant in turn the same questions. I think what he would learn would be a revelation to him and how few subtenants have the blessed privilege of privacy for the rent they pay.

This is my own experience. In September, 1917, I rented a room in an apartment in the Alabama, paying $15 per month, the price for which it had been rented the previous year. The furniture in the room originally cost about $150, some has been in use 12 years, all of it 4 years. So there was no especial consideration for fine furniture. My verbal contract was very clear. I was not to be disturbed during the period, September, 1917, to June, 1918. I expected to go to Seattle about the 20th of June, 1918. About April 1, 1918, I received notice that the room was wanted May 1. This was breaking the contract. Upon going into the matter with my landlady I was informed she had an offer of $30 per month for my room from an Army man and wife, who would take their meals with her mother, who lived in a different house, paying therefor $64 per month. In that way the room would yield them $94 per month. (Pure patriotism, wasn't it?) Also she was considering an offer of $125 per month for the entire apartment for the summer months. Heretofore she has never been able to get more than $40 per month, furnished, for the summer months, and glad to get it.

She admitted that she was breaking the contract (I have this in writing); told me there was nothing personal, said that in many ways it had been very nice to have me during the winter, but gave me to plainly understand she must have the room May 1, as she wished to work in conjunction with her mother, etc. Later, when I found I was so rushed with my charitable and office work that I could not find time to hunt other quarters, she graciously permitted me to stay until June 1. I to pay $22 per month for the privilege. It looks as though she agrees with the Germans that an agreement is a mere bit of nothingness. Her action has upset every plan I had and but for the fact that a friend is going to take care of me until I can get located, the situation for me would be serious. This is my experience, and I think you could find others who have had the same.

The owner of the Alabama has been rather bitterly berated by the press, yet it is his tenants who are really doing the profiteering. There is his side of it, which has impressed me the past six months. The tenants by overloading their apartments make it harder for the telephone and elevator girls, and these people "quit" when overworked. Halls are harder to clean, an enormous quantity of hot water must be provided, and coal has increased in price. There is extra wear and tear on apartments, paper and paint become used up more quickly, plumbing gives out, and the wear and tear on hardwood floors, which are especially nice in the Alabama. From what I can learn there has been very little, if any, increase in rents all these years to the long-term tenants.

I do not wish to imply that all tenants are bitten by the profit bug, and there is only one way to stop it, that is for the owner to have the right to say to his tenants who abuse the subletting privilege, or who profiteer, that they can not renew their leases. Also the owner should not be permitted to rent apartment after apartment to people who want to use them solely for profit, as is being done in some of the apartment houses in this city. I have talked with the tenants in the Cecil, Ontario, and Wardman Courts, and they all say the same thing—rents are not unduly high, but the people who sublet are making the profit at the expense of and reputation for fair dealing of the owner.

I do not know the owner of the Alabama. I have no ax to grind in writing this, but it seems to me the owner and agent are not getting a square deal.

BUREAU OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask, out of order, to call up for immediate consideration the bill (H. R. 11245) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and an act in amendment thereto, approved October 6, 1917. It was reported unanimously by the Finance Committee, and was passed by the House without objection. A report accompanies the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 13, article 1, of the act approved October 6, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," be, and is hereby, amended by striking out the following words in the last sentence: "To regulate the matter of compensation, if any, but in no case to exceed 10 per cent, to be paid to claim agents and attorneys for services in connection with any of the matters provided for in articles 2, 3, and 4," and insert at the end of the sentence the following words: "Provided, however, That payment to any attorney or agent for such assistance as may be required in the preparation and execution of the necessary papers shall not exceed $3 in any one case: And provided further, That no claim agent or attorney shall be recognized in the presentation or adjudication of claims under articles 2, 3, and 4, except that in the event of disagreement as to a claim under the contract of insurance between the bureau and any beneficiary or beneficiaries thereunder, an action on the claim may be brought against the United States in the district court of the United States in and for the district in which such beneficiaries or any one of them resides, and that whenever judgment shall be rendered in an action brought pursuant to this provision, the court, as part of its judgment, shall determine and allow such reasonable attorney's fees, not to exceed 5 per cent of the amount recovered, to be paid by the claimant in behalf of whom such proceedings were instituted to his attorney.

"Any person who shall directly or indirectly, solicit, contract for, charge, or receive, or who shall attempt to solicit, contract for, charge, or receive, any fee or compensation, except as herein provided, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for each and every offense shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment at hard labor for not more than two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment," so that the section as amended shall read as follows:

"SEC. 13. That the director, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall administer, execute, and enforce the provisions of this act, and for that purpose have full power and authority to make rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, necessary or appropriate to carry out its purposes, and shall decide all questions arising under the act, except as otherwise provided in section 5. Wherever under any provision or provisions of the act regulations are directed or authorized to be made, such regulations, unless the context otherwise requires, shall or may be made by the director, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The director shall adopt reasonable and proper rules to govern the procedure of the divisions and to regulate and provide for the nature and extent of the proofs and evidence and the method of taking and furnishing the same in order to establish the right to benefits of allowance, allotments, compensation, or insurance provided for in this act, the forms of application of those claiming to be entitled to such benefits, the methods of making investigations and medical examinations, and the manner and form of adjudications and awards: Provided, however, That payment to any attorney or agent for such assistance as may be required in the preparation and execution of the necessary papers shall not exceed $3 in any one case: And provided further, That no claim agent or attorney shall be recognized in the presentation or adjudication of claims under articles 2, 3, and 4, except that in the event of disagreement as to a claim under the contract of insurance between the bureau and any beneficiary or beneficiaries thereunder an action on the claim may be brought against the United States in the district court of the United States in and for the district in which such beneficiaries or any one of them resides, and that whenever judgment shall be rendered in an action brought pursuant to this provision the court, as part of its judgment, shall determine and allow such reasonable attorney's fees, not to exceed 5 per cent of the amount recovered, to be paid by the claimant in behalf of whom such proceedings were instituted, to his attorney, said fee to be paid out of the payments to be made to the beneficiary under the judgment rendered at a rate not exceeding one-tenth of each of such payments until paid.

"Any person who shall, directly or indirectly, solicit, contract for, charge, or receive, or who shall attempt to solicit, contract for, charge, or receive any fee or compensation, except as herein provided, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and for each and every offense shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $500 or by imprisonment at hard labor for not more than two years, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

SEC. 2. That Article IV of said act, approved October 6, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," is hereby amended by striking out section 405 thereof.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SIGNATURES ON BANK NOTES.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 3900) to amend and reenact section 5172 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. It is a bill relating to the signatures on the $1 and $2 bills which have been required to be issued in lieu of the $350,000,000 of silver certificates that are to be retired. It provides that the signature can be lithographed instead of actual signing.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that the bill be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator whether it will lead to any discussion?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I do not think it will.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If it leads to any discussion I want it put over until the morning business is closed. I have no objection to it myself.

Mr. SMOOT. I will state to the Senator that I do not think it will lead to any discussion.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with amendments, on page 1, line 4, to strike out the words "and reenacted so as," and on page 2, line 1, after the word "blank," to insert a comma and the words "or bearing engraved signatures of officers as herein provided," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5172 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5172. In order to furnish suitable notes for circulation, the Comptroller of the Currency shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury cause plates and dies to be engraved, in the best manner to guard against counterfeiting and fraudulent alterations, and shall have printed therefrom, and numbered, such quantity of circulating notes in blank, or bearing engraved signatures of officers as herein provided, of the denominations of $1, $2, $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $500, and $1,000, as may be required to supply the associations entitled to receive the same. Such notes shall express upon their face that they are secured by United States bonds, deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, by the written or engraved signatures of the Treasurer and Register, and by the imprint of the seal of the Treasury; and shall also express upon their face the promise of the association receiving the same to pay on demand, attested by the written or engraved signatures of the president or vice president and cashier; and shall bear such devices and such other statements, and shall be in such form as the Secretary of the Treasury shall, by regulation, direct."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 5172 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an order, which I ask may be entered by unanimous consent. It is to fill certain committee vacancies, which it is important to have filled at once.

The order was read, as follows:

Ordered, That the membership of the Committee on Military Affairs be increased from 17 members to 19 members, and that Senator SMITH of Georgia be, and he is hereby, assigned to membership on the Committee on Military Affairs; that Senator HITCHCOCK, of Nebraska, be, and he is hereby, assigned to the chairmanship of the Committee on Foreign Relations; that Senator ROBINSON, of Arkansas, be assigned to membership on the Committee on Foreign Relations; that Senator LEWIS, of Illinois, be assigned to membership on the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator from Virginia accept an amendment in behalf of the minority members.

Mr. MARTIN. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. In behalf of the minority, I move that the name of Senator KNOX be added as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MARTIN. I am very glad to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah, adding the name of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be made, and the order as amended will be agreed to.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I beg the indulgence of the Senate for just a minute, as I am compelled to return to Kentucky at 2 o'clock. I came from there last night for the purpose of casting a vote in favor of the proposed amendment to the Constitution giving suffrage to the women of the country. I left the sick bed of the person nearest to me now living. As I said, I shall return at 2 o'clock.

I should like in this connection to read the following telegram:

DETROIT, MICH., May 8, 1918.

Senator SMITH of Arizona:

The following resolution was unanimously passed at Woman's Party meeting at Detroit, May 7:

"Whereas, when the vote was taken in the United States Senate May 6 on question whether Senate should proceed on May 10 to debate woman suffrage amendment 19 Senators pledged in favor of amendment were absent.

"Resolved, This meeting express indignation at absence of pledged supporters and urge speedy return to work for immediate passing of suffrage amendment."

I received half a dozen telegrams telling me that the vote would be taken on to-day. I responded for the purpose of casting my vote. I am disappointed in not being able to do so.

I hope the next time Senators who are absent on matters of necessity are notified to be here there will be some definiteness in the reports. I received from Senators and from Members of the House messages that the vote would be taken to-day. As I said before, I have returned here in response to the call, and I shall leave at 2 o'clock, and if the joint resolution comes up within the next 10 days I shall not be here. The long trip and the necessity of my immediate return will be somewhat trying on me at this time, but I can never feel regret at having tried to help the great cause, but only regret being disappointed at the end of my effort.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, the telegram just read by the Senator from Arizona moves me to say a word.

As my colleagues know, I obtained a formal leave of absence from the Senate in order to visit my son, who was on sick leave from the Army in southern California, and my aged mother, who was about to pass her 83d birthday in that State. Advised that a vote would be taken to-day upon the constitutional amendment referred to by the Senator from Arizona, I am here and in my seat and ready to vote. In fact, I am anxious to vote for that amendment in accordance with the pledge of my party and the pledge of all parties. I should regard it as a very unfortunate event in the history of the Senate if it failed to take up this important question now and settle it, and settle it rightly.

I am, as I said, anxious to vote for the passage of what is known as the suffrage constitutional amendment, and not having been advised that it would be called up earlier than to-day I have no apology to make to anyone for my absence. I would absent myself again under similar circumstances. Nevertheless, I am now here ready to vote and have been ready ever since the session began. I shall feel a deep sense of regret if the measure that has challenged the attention of the Senate so long is not promptly put upon its immediate passage.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in view of the fact that explanations are in order this morning, I desire to say that I notice the return to the Senate of my very genial friend and distinguished colleague, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and I feel sure that he also has returned for the purpose of casting his vote for this amendment, and I think the Senate will so determine, unless he assumes a contrary attitude. [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have listened to the expressions of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] regarding the vote upon the woman-suffrage amendment. This occasion is not only disappointing to them but it is one of keen disappointment to me and to the vast majority of the Members of this body. It is also the occasion of keen disappointment to millions of men and women in the United States. On Monday last, by the direction of the Committee on Woman Suffrage, which has had this amendment under consideration, I gave notice that on to-day, at the conclusion of the morning business, I would move to take up that amendment for consideration. At that time the committee felt that it had reasonable grounds to believe that, if brought to a vote, the amendment would receive the affirmative votes of at least two-thirds of this body. Since that time information has been received that causes the committee to doubt that fact. It is not believed that there are one-third of the Members of this body irrevocably committed to the defeat of the amendment, if brought to a vote; in the opinion of the committee, nearly two-thirds of the Members of this body would cast at this time affirmative votes; but it is so important that the amendment be not brought to a vote until there is a reasonable assurance of its passage that the committee has decided not to ask immediate action by the Senate.

The amendment has been passed by a two-thirds vote of the House of Representatives. If brought to a vote at this time and defeated, it would mean that no further action could be taken upon it during this Congress. So important is it that this amendment be adopted when brought to a vote, that the members of the committee deem that it should not be brought to a vote until there be reasonable assurance of its passage here.

When I said that I did not believe one-third of the Members of this body were irrevocably committed to the defeat of the amendment, I based that statement upon information obtained from Senators themselves, not necessarily by me directly, but by those who have been in close touch with this movement. There are Senators here who seek to register the will of their constituents upon this subject, and I think rightly so. I mean by saying "rightly so," that their position can be justified to the minds of reasonable men. Whether or not I should take that position is beside the point at this time.

The movement in favor of woman suffrage is proceeding with increased force every day that passes. This is an era not only of revolution in the nations of the world, but it is an era of evolution and of progress. Wherever you turn, to the remote corners of the earth, you find that this question of enfranchising the women is one of the most seriously considered of all questions. Enfranchisement does not necessarily mean the ability to cast the ballot, but it means enfranchisement in its broader sense; the freedom, the liberty which the female sex may obtain, the removal of the bondage which has been put upon them for generations and centuries.

This movement in the United States has been progressing even more rapidly than many Senators in this body possibly appreciate. Within the last year many things have happened in connection with woman suffrage in the United States. I have a table here which shows the various things which have been done in the United States during the year 1917, looking toward the ultimate enfranchisement of the women of this country, and I ask, Mr. President, that the table may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I thought the Senator had concluded. I merely want to get the floor for a few moments after he shall have concluded.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am therefore, Mr. President, gravely and keenly disappointed to make the announcement to the Senate that on to-day the motion to take up this amendment for consideration will not be made by me.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I suppose those of us who are opposed to this amendment may rely upon its advocates to give us due notice of their purpose to call up the bill, so that we may certainly express the opposition that exists to it when a vote will be asked.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I assure the Senator from Georgia that reasonable notice will be given.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Just one word more. I merely wish to add that I regret very much we will not have a vote to-day. I think if we had a vote to-day it would effectually dispose of the subject for this Congress.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. When the next notice is given that we will vote on a given day, as the Senator has promised, will it be understood then that the notice is upon the condition that we will vote provided the Senator has enough votes to win; and if he has not, we will not vote, as appears to be the case to-day? [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The remark of the Senator from Missouri is very entertaining, as usual. Answering it seriously, however, I desire to say that notice will not be given unless we feel reasonably assured that we have votes enough to carry the joint resolution, and that when notice is given the motion will be made, unless something occurs in the interim, such as has occurred since the last notice, which would warrant the committee in deferring action.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I want to ask the Senator if he can give the Senate any assurance as to whether the corridors of the Senate will be flooded with attractive lobbyists until he is ready to call up the joint resolution? [Laughter.]

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I sincerely hope they will, and I not only hope that, but I hope that the citizens in the States represented by Senators who are disposed to vote against this motion will make it so warm for such Senators that they will not dare to vote against the proposed constitutional amendment when it comes up for consideration and action.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to say to the Senator from New Mexico in regard to this question of "making it warm" that there are some Senators on this floor who have been advocating woman suffrage for the last 25 years, long before the late New York election. Those Senators have some convictions of their own. They believe each State should settle the matter for itself and are opposed to forcing it upon States that do not want it or by reason of peculiar local conditions are not prepared for it. I say, therefore, in answer to the Senator's suggestion, that no amount of telegrams which can be poured in here will have any effect upon the Senator from Idaho. Upon this subject he has views which are not subject to change.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to suggest to the Senator that, whenever the people of the State I in part represent desire suffrage, they will not need an amendment to the Constitution to obtain it. Our legislature meets in the summer; and, if they desire woman suffrage, the question can be submitted to the people of Georgia, and this fall they will obtain it, without any interference with their wishes, through national legislation. If they do not wish it, I prefer to leave them to their preference.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that shall be permitted, will the women be allowed to vote as well as the men?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; and women do not vote now in the other States which still may consider the subject.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the vote of the men of the State would not by any means show that a majority of the citizens are for or against the joint resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In every State the vote of those with suffrage is first required to determine whether the requirements for suffrage shall be changed—those who have it must pass upon the increase or decrease—and the same rule will apply in my State that is applied in all the other States.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is, the men of the State will decide whether or not the women shall vote?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is true; but I will go further and say that I believe whenever the men of my State are satisfied that the majority of the white women of the State wish suffrage they will give it to them without outside interference.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. MARTIN. I ask the Senator to yield to me for just a second. I simply desire to say that I would be delighted to see a referendum of the women of Virginia alone, and I would be glad to have the women of my State determine this matter for the State of Virginia. Whenever I am satisfied that the majority of the white women of Virginia desire the vote, I will support the proposed constitutional amendment; I will vote to give them the vote. I repeat, I would be delighted to see a referendum, not of the men, but of the women alone, and I will follow the wishes of the women, regardless of what the men think and say about it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Let me suggest that such was not the course pursued in the Senate with reference to the prohibition amendment. Consistency should require that we should have acted the same way in the imposition of prohibition upon the United States as it is now proposed to submit the question of universal suffrage to the people of the United States.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the remarks of the Senator from Colorado are indeed timely.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from New Mexico can find a vast distinction between those two questions.

Mr. THOMAS. But not as to the method of their constitutional regulation?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I think they can find a vast difference as to constitutional features. It is a very different proposition to insist upon the right to determine by the votes of your State what shall be the requirement for suffrage of your own State and to insist upon forbidding in an adjoining State the production of intoxicating liquors which may be shipped into your State, to the detriment of your people.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question, with the consent of the Senator from New Mexico.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia a question as to his offer to vote in favor of the proposed constitutional amendment whenever the women of his State desire that privilege. I will ask the Senator whether he has ever made any effort——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What was the statement of the Senator?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I said that the men of my State this summer and this fall could adopt woman suffrage if they wished; and when I was asked about the attitude of the women toward the question of voting I added that I was sure the men of my State would give the women the right of suffrage as soon as they were satisfied a majority of the white women of Georgia desired it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator will recognize that there is no provision whatever made——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. The Senator from North Dakota will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to inquire what matter is before the Senate now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is nothing before the Senate so far as the Chair is aware.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] may be permitted to say a word, as he indicated some time ago that he wished to address the Senate briefly at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McCUMBER. I object.

Mr. THOMAS. I object for this reason: I think the Senator from New Mexico should have been permitted to complete his remarks upon this subject——

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so, too.

Mr. THOMAS. And he not being allowed to do that, I am obliged to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We are under the heading of morning business, and, except by unanimous consent, no Senator can proceed unless there is something before the Senate. The presentation of petitions and memorials is in order.

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 223).

Mr. ASHURST. I submit the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill, and I ask that the formal reading of the report be dispensed with. It is a somewhat lengthy report and I ask that it be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will not the Senator consent that it go over?

Mr. ASHURST. I was just about to make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the conference report will be printed and also printed in the RECORD.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8696) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 7, 8, 12, 13, 15, 28, 29, 40, 41, 47, 50, 55, 72, 82, 85, and 89.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 6, 9, 14, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 31, 34, 35, 36, 37, 39, 42, 43, 45, 46, 48, 52, 53, 56, 57, 58, 62, 63, 66, 67, 68, 69, 71, 73, 74, 78, 81, 84, 87, 88, 90, and 91, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3 and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of the amendment proposed, after the word "That," insert the following: "on and after September 1, 1918"; and in line 3 of the amendment proposed, before the word "country," insert the word "Indian"; and in line 3 of the amendment proposed, after the word "is," insert the words "or was"; and the Senate agree to the same.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, BOWDOIN, MONT.

Mr. MYERS. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 4154) granting to the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Bowdoin, Mont., for the benefit of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Bowdoin, Mont., lots 12 and 13, in block 21, town site of Bowdoin, State of Montana, and I submit a report (No. 434) thereon. I ask that the bill be read, and then I shall ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. It provides for the sale at the appraised value of a couple of lots to the trustees of a church who desire to build right away.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I shall not object to the consideration of this bill, but I think it is a pretty wise plan to have bills printed——

Mr. MYERS. This bill is printed.

Mr. TOWNSEND. And to have the reports printed, so that we may know exactly what is going on.

Mr. MYERS. The bill is printed and there are not over a dozen lines in it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But the Senator making the report of the bill this morning asks us to vote upon it without our knowing anything about it. Now, I shall not object to this request, but during the morning hour hereafter I shall object to these requests for unanimous consent to consider bills that have not been printed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MYERS. I think we ought to have a call of the calendar some day, but it seems that we can not do it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an objection, and the bill will go to the calendar.

Mr. MYERS. Is there an objection to the consideration of this bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is. Are there further reports of committees?

Mr. MYERS. I make a report, and I should like to be indulged sufficiently to ask what Senator objected?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. MYERS. I ask the Senator from North Dakota to withdraw his objection. The bill is simply to sell to a church close to the North Dakota line a couple of town lots at the appraised value, so that the church people may build on them. They want to build right away.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, advantage will be taken of the bill for a further discussion of the suffrage question, which is not before the Senate. I think we have had enough of it.

Mr. MYERS. I will guarantee that that will not be done.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator can not guarantee it.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I want to take occasion to say that I do think we ought to have a call of the calendar at some time. The calendar has only been called once this session; and I still ask the Senator from North Dakota to withdraw his objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I call for the regular order.

Mr. McCUMBER. We can reach the bill on the calendar.

Mr. MYERS. No; the calendar will not be called any more at this session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are still in order.

LANDS IN ARIZONA.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 3914) authorizing a right of way for the transportation of water for improvement of grazing and development of the live-stock industry upon public and national forest lands in Arizona, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 435) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WALSH:

A bill (S. 4522) to provide for an exchange of certain lands in the Flathead Reservation, Mont. (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. CHAMBERLAIN:

A bill (S. 4523) to transfer the tract of land known as the Lighthouse Reservation at North Point, Md., from the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce to the jurisdiction of the War Department (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 4524) to validate the homestead entry of Lizzie G. Garin; to the Committee on Public Lands.

A bill (S. 4525) to provide for the construction of an automobile road in Yellowstone National Park, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. SWANSON:

A bill (S. 4526) for the relief of the Arundel Sand & Gravel Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

REGENTS OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. LODGE. I introduce a joint resolution providing for the filling of a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 155) providing for the filling of a vacancy which will occur July 2, 1918, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, of the class other than Members of Congress, which will occur on July 2, 1918, by reason of the expiration of the term of the Hon. Charles W. Fairbanks, of Indiana, be filled by the appointment of Charles W. Fairbanks for the ensuing term.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

RENT ADMINISTRATOR FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the further consideration of House bill 9248.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I object, and I ask for the regular order—the calling of the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the further consideration of House bill 9248.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9248) to prevent extortion, to impose taxes upon certain incomes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CURTIS obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, first let the pending amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] to the committee amendment, as follows:

On page 12, line 6, after the word "Government," insert "or has been disposed of to a bona fide purchaser for his own occupancy."

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, first I want to thank the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] for asking that I be given unanimous consent to occupy the floor for a few minutes to discuss the woman-suffrage question. I shall not detain the Senate a minute. As a friend of the amendment and one who has worked hard to bring it to a vote, I am very sorry indeed that we could not have a vote to-day; but I do not feel that it would be just to this side of the Chamber to let this occasion pass without stating that on this, the Republican, side more than two-thirds of the Members are in favor of the Federal amendment for woman suffrage. We have 32 Members on this side who are ready to vote for the amendment at any time. There is 1 doubtful vote and 11 votes against it.

With this statement as to the position of this side, I will let the case rest. I do hope the chairman of the committee will insist upon a vote on this amendment before the session is over, and I feel confident that when the vote is taken some of the Senators who have been so jubilant this morning may be laughing out of the other side of their mouths.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas remarks that those who are now smiling may soon laugh out of the other corner of their mouths. Really nothing amusing has occurred this morning, except the fact that after a notice had been solemnly given that to-day a vote would be demanded upon the suffrage amendment; and after several Senators had traveled hundreds of miles to vote upon the question, the chairman of the committee blandly announces that what he meant was that there would be a vote this morning provided he had enough votes to win for his side, but that otherwise the matter would go over until some more fortuitous hour.

I think we ought to take the vote now. The matter has been thoroughly canvassed. The Senate ought not to be required to constantly dance attendance upon this particular bill. We are entitled to vote now or to know that we will not be required to vote at this session. The vote should not be delayed in the hope that somebody may die, or somebody grow sick, or somebody be temporarily absent, and thus the necessary majority be secured.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply want to concur in what the Senator from Missouri has said. I believe we ought to vote on this amendment to-day. Notice was given that we were going to vote on it, and, whether it goes up or goes down, in my judgment, it ought to be voted on.

Mr. REED. That would seem to me to be the fairest way. There are a number of Senators who are here at real inconvenience. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] returned, although he was not in good physical health. He returned, I think, to vote against the amendment. On the other hand, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] left the sick bed of a near relative and came here, himself out of health, intending, I feel very sure, to vote for the amendment. There are other cases in the Senate of a similar nature; and I think the fair thing to do is to go on and vote and let the question be settled. The notice was brought up by the proponents of the measure. They ought to keep faith with their own proposition and vote now.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think that those Senators who found that they could come here to vote on one question could probably remain here when we are considering probably the most momentous questions that were ever before any Congress—questions with regard to the proper and necessary legislation to win this war?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I hardly think that puts the Senators in just the light that the Senator would like to place them. It is entirely conceivable that a Senator might leave the bedside of a sick child or a sick relative and come here to vote upon an important constitutional amendment and then desire to hurry back, and yet be justified in remaining away when there was only ordinary business before the Senate.

The Senators I happen to have mentioned by name have been among the best attendants upon the body. No one would accuse them of having ever neglected their duties.

I think we ought to vote on this question. I am quite willing to take the full responsibility of my vote to-day. I have no idea that my mind will be changed between now and the day when the vote is to be taken. I believe everybody in the Senate has his mind made up, and in view of the fact that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS], who is one of the most gallant champions of the rights of the fair sex that there is upon the floor of the Senate, states that before the question is ended we may be laughing out of the other corners of our mouths. I all the more desire a vote, so that we may escape the anxiety incident to the consciousness that dire fate is at some indefinite hour sure to overtake and consume us. I therefore trust that we may now know what is going to happen to us.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it seems strange to me that the Senator from Missouri should be insisting upon a vote now, in view of the fact that when the vote was taken the other day on the question as to whether the amendment should be made a special order for to-day I find in the RECORD that he voted against it.

Mr. REED. Certainly I did.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I can not see the consistency of the position the Senator has taken.

Mr. REED. I can make it quite plain. I voted against that motion, believing that that would dispose of the matter; that an adverse vote against taking up the proposition would be regarded by its proponents as settling the question as to whether there was any use or any sense in attempting to pass the resolution at this Congress. Those who opposed the measure debated the motion to take the measure up, but that did not satisfy its advocates. They at once gave us notice to meet them here to-day for the final contest, so we got ready for to-day, and here we are. Now it transpires that as soon as our opponents found we were ready they discovered they were not ready. So they now blandly inform us that they will not permit a vote until they can have an advantage they do not now possess. Now, I think we are all here on due notice; the ropes are all strung, the posts are up, the sponges and the pails are here, and the towels, and everything that goes with the battle. Why not have it out?

Mr. TILLMAN. I say so, too.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator suggested that some other day, when we were not ready, the proponents of the amendment would bring it up. In the first place, I understand that they have assured us that we will have full notice; and outside of that I think we can assure them that if they bring it up some day unexpectedly, when we are not ready, we will not vote that day, and probably we will not vote for several days thereafter, until we get ready.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, on Wednesday of this week the Senate Committee on Public Lands met and made a unanimous order for the reporting out of two bills. One was to be reported by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. It was a bill that was of interest to Utah. The other was a little bill that I reported out this morning, of some small interest to a few church people in Montana. It was agreed that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was to report the Utah bill and that I was to report the Montana bill. It was agreed that each of us was to ask unanimous consent, upon making the report, for the immediate consideration of his bill.

I was unable to be here Wednesday during the morning hour, being kept away by official business; but I find, by referring to the RECORD of that day, that the following occurred:

> Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 4244) for the relief of entrymen within the Castle Peak irrigation project in Utah, and I submit a report (No. 432) thereon. As it is an emergency matter and a very short bill, I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.
> The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?
> Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to hear the bill read.
> The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.
> The Secretary read the bill, as follows:
> Then the bill was read.
> Mr. SHAFROTH. I have no objection, Mr. President.
> There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.
> The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

There was no Senator on this side of the Chamber who objected to the request made by the Senator from Utah for the consideration of that bill. As I say, unfortunately I was not able to be here at that time, being deluged with official business, and was not able to make my report at that time. To-day is the first day since then that I have been able to be here during the morning hour; and, being my first opportunity, I asked that my bill be acted upon immediately, but did not get the necessary consent. That only confirms what I have long believed, that in this body there are two sets of rules—one set for certain Senators and another set for certain other Senators.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Montana that he ask unanimous consent now to pass that bill, and I can not conceive that there will be any objection to it.

Mr. MYERS. I have asked unanimous consent three times this morning, and there is another bill before the Senate now. I am not permitted by the rules to ask unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not want in the least to interfere with a bill of the kind mentioned by the Senator from Montana, but at the same time we have a very, very important matter here that concerns not a few people—and I say that with all due respect to the good people who are interested in that church proposition—but the whole people of the District are interested in it. My judgment is that we will be able to complete the consideration of this bill within a very short time, and I assure the Senator from Montana that so far as I am concerned I shall be very glad to help him to get up his bill and have it disposed of at the proper time.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to assure the Senator I do not wish to see his bill blocked; I want to see it disposed of; but I am also quite sure it would not take two minutes to pass the bill of the Senator from Montana, because there can be no possible objection to the bill itself.

Mr. MYERS. I think the Senator is not authorized to say that there can be no objection to it. I think there will be objection.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator might try. We are permitted under our rules to transact any business by unanimous consent, and if it leads to discussion let——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I feel that the rent bill, so called, has the right of way, by the courtesy of the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. Under the circumstances, I think we ought to dispose of it first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let the Secretary state the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will restate it.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, page 12, line 6, after the word "Government" and before the semicolon, insert "or has been disposed of to a bona fide purchaser for his own occupancy," so that if amended it will read:

Or that the premises are reasonably required by a landlord for the occupation by himself or his family while in the employ of or officially connected with the Government, or has been disposed of to a bona fide purchaser for his own occupancy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to suggest, inasmuch as an amendment has just been made to the text on page 12, that on line 5 of the same page, after the word "or," it be amended by the insertion of the words "the actual members of," so as to read: "reasonably required by a landlord for the occupation by himself or the actual members of his family." The term "family" is a very general term. It can be made to cover a multitude of individuals.

Mr. POMERENE. So far as I am individually concerned, I have no objection to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 5, after the word "or," insert the words "the actual members of."

Mr. SAULSBURY. If I may call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to an amendment which has been made to the rent joint resolution which passed here, I think it might be well for us to conform to a phrase which means the same thing, so that we may save any discussion hereafter upon it.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no objection to the phraseology, but unless the word "family" is qualified it may prove to be too broad to subserve the purposes of the bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The phraseology adopted by our committee with reference to the resolution was "either by himself or his wife, children, or dependents while he is in the employ of the Government."

Mr. THOMAS. I am perfectly satisfied to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware, because it means the same thing.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It seems to me it might be better to adopt that phraseology.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, strike out the word "family" and insert "wife, children, or dependents," so as to read:

For the occupation by himself or his wife, children, or dependents while he is in the employ of or officially connected with any branch of the Government.

Mr. THOMAS. That is satisfactory.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Now, on page 13, line 3, after the word "maintenance," I move to amend by inserting the words "actually incurred," so that the clause will read:

In fixing rents of real estate there shall be taken into account the taxes and assessments thereon, the cost of reasonable repairs and maintenance actually incurred.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. On line 19 of the same page, after the word "Columbia," I move to amend by inserting the clause which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. After the words "District of Columbia," on line 19, page 13, insert:

Apartment houses which have been or may be converted into single rooms or suites furnished by or for the owner or lessee and rented for transient occupation shall be classed as hotels and be subject to all the ordinances, rules, regulations, and laws of the District of Columbia relating to hotels.

Mr. THOMAS. My purpose, Mr. President, in offering that amendment is to meet a condition that I am informed exists to some degree and which will probably be extended, and that is the transformation of apartment houses into rooms for transient lodgers. My information is that one or two of the large apartment houses are now or soon will be undergoing that transformation. The kitchen and other fixtures needed for housekeeping in the apartments are to be removed, the apartments themselves are to be done away with, and suites of rooms are to be substituted for them. They are then to be furnished and placed in the charge of a keeper or janitor and rented to transients at so much per day per room. Of course, the revenue will be very much larger than will be obtained otherwise, and at the same time the buildings so transformed will come in competition with hotels.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator have in mind this fact? Assuming the bill substantially as it is now drawn should become a law of the District, then all occupying tenants would be permitted to continue in possession of the premises so long as they paid the rent and complied with the other terms of the lease.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I take that into consideration; but at the same time I recall that while the provisions of the bill to which the Senator refers might prevent the consummation of the present purpose with regard to apartment houses, other apartment houses are in course of construction, while still others are being occupied by the Government and will become vacant as soon as the barracks that are now in process of construction down at the Mall are completed, and, of course, those houses would not be included within the operation of the bill, so far as that feature of it is concerned without something additional.

Mr. POMERENE. May I interrupt the Senator long enough to ask that the amendment be read again? I am not quite sure that I understood it.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). The amendment to the amendment will be again read.

The Secretary again read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Ohio will recall that the Government now occupies two large and entirely new apartment houses on Fifteenth Street near Massachusetts Avenue. It is contemplated to vacate them just as soon as the construction now going on in the Mall will accommodate the business now lodged in those apartment houses. They will, therefore, be vacant and subject to any change that the owner may desire to make for the purpose of carrying out the condition which this amendment is designed to regulate, and there are others, of course, besides the two to which I have referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMERENE obtained the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. On page 9——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I will take as brief time as possible.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio has been recognized. Does he yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. On page 9, line 17, after the word "therefor," I move to insert the folowing:

Elevator and other service as furnished upon said date shall continue.

This amendment was suggested to me by a tenant——

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator please read it again?

Mr. THOMAS (reading)—

Elevator and other service as furnished upon said date shall continue.

I was informed by a tenant of an apartment house on Fourteenth Street that since early last winter the elevator service has been discontinued by the landlord because of the alleged expense due to the very great rise in the cost of fuel.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask how many stories there are in the building?

Mr. THOMAS. There are, I believe, five—five or six. I think that provision should be made for the continuance of such service as has been furnished, because in these days it is not an easy task to be compelled to take an apartment near the roof of these modern buildings and be dependent upon your own powers of locomotion to reach it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion it seems to me that that is a matter which could be provided for in the lease, and I think it is provided for in most leases. I am afraid if we go too much into details here we may multiply our troubles.

Mr. THOMAS. It may be that the phraseology of the bill is sufficiently broad to comprehend these conditions. This legislation, however, is not at all popular with landlords. If I were a landlord, I certainly would not feel at all enthusiastic over the propect which this bill presents. That is human nature. That is nothing for which the owner of the property can be criticized.

Mr. POMERENE. There has been a great deal of that here, as well as elsewhere in the country.

Mr. THOMAS. It is quite probable, if we enact legislation which is regarded by landlords as extra drastic or more drastic than it should be, inconveniences not hitherto existing may either be created or be permitted to develop, and this is designed to meet that situation. I suggest if the Senator will accept the amendment and it is too drastic it can be taken care of in conference.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield, if I have the floor.

Mr. POMERENE. I yielded to the Senator from Colorado, and I think he has the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. I sympathize with the purpose the Senator from Colorado wishes to reach, but does it not strike the Senator that we are going too far when we undertake to place our hands upon the neck of the landlord and say he shall do something that it may be beyond his power to do? It may well be that it will be impossible to get men to run elevators for anything like a reasonable pay. I realize that if we permit them to rent in the District we may annex certain conditions and fix the price that may be charged for the rent, but to make a bald, flat, blunt proposition that they must furnish elevator service it appears to me is going further than we ought.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, this bill is drastic. It is admittedly drastic, and it must be drastic, else it would not accomplish the purpose for which it is designed. Inasmuch as that is the case, why should we not draft a bill and enact a law that will meet conditions as far as they can be foreseen? I am not one of those who believe it is beyond the power of Congress to enact legislation of this sort for the District of Columbia. I think it is a war measure. Those who are here in the District, and necessarily here, doing the work of the Government in the time of the war are just as much a part of the force engaged in carrying on the war as the soldiers in the cantonments and at the front, and if the Government has not the power to shelter them as well as to care for soldiers and others who are wearing the uniform of the United States it is a Government which needs strengthening in one very important particular.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. In just a moment. So the objection to the proposed amendment does not appeal to me, in view of the fact that we are taking extraordinary steps in this legislation. I now yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I only want to suggest to the Senator from Colorado that in a way the proposition which he suggests has been cared for in the bill by allowing the landlord to charge as rental a certain net sum, 7 per cent, or practically 105 per cent of the value of the property.

Mr. THOMAS. Which is too much.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Well, without discussing the question as to its being too much, he is allowed to deduct from his gross rent everything that he pays for elevator service. Doubtless he will run the elevators if he can get the service. It seems to me when we go into the details of tenancy and place duties on the landlord in such detail by statute and put a penalty on him for not performing them, we are going far beyond the necessity of the case.

Mr. THOMAS. Where would the Senator draw the line?

Mr. SAULSBURY. There is always a shadowy zone, as the Senator knows, and because the bill must necessarily be drastic is no reason why it should be unnecessarily drastic. I think the provisions of this act comply with every reasonable complaint that a tenant can make against a landlord or a landlord against a tenant in an adherence to the principle here.

Mr. THOMAS. I quite agree it should not be too drastic. If I did not think this provision was necessary, I certainly would not introduce it and would not insist upon it. The elevator service is to-day as much an essential part of a building used for public services or for collective residential purposes as heat, ventilation, and light.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado a question. I understood the Senator to say that as a war measure the Government has a right to provide for taking property for housing these employees?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. But has it a right to take that property or to take the use of that property without just compensation?

Mr. THOMAS. No; neither has a landlord the right to hold up an employee of the Government for more than just compensation.

Mr. KELLOGG. Quite so.

Mr. THOMAS. When he does that, then one of the war powers of the Government, in my judgment, should be exercised for the protection of that employee.

I submit the amendment, as far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I have not yielded the floor quite yet.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was under the impression that the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I know the Chair had that impression. I have just one more amendment that I will offer. I wish to add as a new section to the bill the following:

The provisions of this act shall not apply to leases to tenants who are not actual residents of the District, who are not employees or officers of the Government or Members of Congress, and who have no business actually requiring their presence in the District.

I offer this, Mr. President, because there are a large number of people in the District of Columbia who have no business whatever that justifies their presence here. I do not mean that they are here for an improper purpose or that they have not, as American citizens, the right to be here; but I do not think it is our business to protect the leases of individuals who come here from curiosity or for the excitement which present conditions afford to them, or for any other purposes except those requiring their absolute necessary presence. For example, let me state this: Suppose I am here without any business, without anything which absolutely requires my presence in the District, and I have a lease from the owner of an apartment house; why should the war powers of the Government be exerted to protect me as against my landlord? Should we go further, in other words, with this bill than to make it effective for the necessary purpose of the Government, which is to furnish——

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. Just a moment—to furnish shelter for its own employees and to see to it that that shelter is obtained at a price within their means? That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield in just a moment. That is all right; but when we go beyond that and make this law so universal as to give to individuals who are merely here for purposes of their own and not for purposes of the Government, so that they may have the right to dictate to landlords, and the landlords submit to them, it is stretching the power of government, in my judgment, beyond its legitimate boundaries.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I must first yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. Under the plan now suggested by the Senator from Colorado the landlord could rent to a person not connected with the Government at any price he chose.

Mr. THOMAS. He could do so to any person who is not required to be here; yes. At the same time he could cancel the lease; and I know of a number of landlords who would be glad to do so in order to furnish a larger amount of space for those who are obliged to be here.

Mr. KENYON. I agree with the Senator that such people ought to be ousted and ought not to be here at all during the war; but will not that result in the landlord preferring to lease to such people and charging them any amount he pleases, thus making less the chance of those connected with the Government to get accommodations?

Mr. THOMAS. There is, of course, the possible danger which the Senator from Iowa suggests; but, Mr. President, we can meet that, and meet it very summarily, if necessary.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NEW. I rose to inquire of the Senator from Colorado if his amendment, which I did not clearly hear as it was read, would include those who are here now in the service of the Red Cross, for instance? They are not, strictly speaking, employees of the Government, and yet they are connected with a very useful organization.

Mr. THOMAS. I thank the Senator from Indiana for his suggestion. Of course, the amendment was not designed to interfere with them; but I do not believe the Government has the power to fix rents or rates in this District for people who have no business here; who simply come and go, and who are here for purposes of pleasure. I will, however, modify the amendment so as to exclude from its operation those people who are here with the Red Cross, with the Young Men's Christian Association, the Young Women's Christian Association, and so forth.

Mr. NEW. That will be satisfactory.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. There are a great many people in Washington who are not engaged in Government work who, however, are citizens of Washington, who live here, and whose vocations are practiced here.

Mr. THOMAS. This amendment does not refer to them. They are expressly excluded from its operation.

Mr. LODGE. How are they expressly excluded?

Mr. THOMAS. They are expressly excluded from its operation because my proposition refers to nonresidents who are here and who have no business here. Of course, I did not and I do not think that legally I could so frame an amendment as to interfere with actual residents; people who live here and who have made their homes here. But suppose some family is here from the city of Boston——

Mr. LODGE. I am surprised at the Senator's moderation.

Mr. THOMAS. So was Lord Clive surprised at his own moderation. It may be that the time will come when I will remedy that which would draw surprise from my distinguished friend.

Mr. LODGE. If we are engaged in this bill in confiscating everybody's property and turning all of the doctors, lawyers, clergymen, tradesmen, and everyone else out of their houses in order to give homes to valuable clerks who are working in the different offices——

Mr. THOMAS. My amendment does not propose to do that.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me the valuable clerks would find themselves without the ordinary machinery of life.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator's apprehensions are altogether too lively concerning the purposes of the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I was not speaking of the amendment; I was speaking of the general bill, which made me think that the amendment was probably in keeping with it.

Mr. THOMAS. The amendment is designed to be in keeping with the bill, which I heartily favor. It is designed also, so far as my poor judgment can determine my action, to supplement and improve that bill. I do not propose by the amendment to interfere with any lawyer who is an actual resident of the District or with any minister who is an actual resident of the District or with any other actual resident of the District; far from it; but if some lawyer from Boston or some minister from Denver or some physician from Richmond, or all of them combined, are in the city of Washington occupying apartments or houses under lease, and they have not any business on earth here except the gratification of their own selfish interests and pleasures, I do not think we should so legislate that they can keep those leases and extend those leases almost at their own price, so to speak, under the protection of the Government, which ought not to give any such protection to that class of people.

Mr. GALLINGER. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator, I apprehend, is aware of the fact that there are scores of physicians and lawyers in this city who have legal residences in the States of Maryland and Virginia, but who also are residents of the District. Surely the Senator would not turn those men out of the District of Columbia?

Mr. THOMAS. That would depend, Mr. President, entirely upon whether or not they have their regular practice here; whether they are established professional men in the District. I certainly would not want to interfere with lawyers if they are simply here for the trial of cases; but then they do not take leases of houses or apartments; they go to hotels.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have reference to professional men who have offices here, but whose homes are in Maryland and Virginia, and possibly in other States.

Mr. THOMAS. But where is their practice?

Mr. GALLINGER. They have their practice here in Washington.

Mr. THOMAS. If their practice is here, then they ought not to be excluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. But they may have more or less practice in their home States.

Mr. THOMAS. In such case they ought not to be excluded, and they are not to be excluded by the amendment, for it reaches only those who have no business requiring their presence here in Washington.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I was called out of the Chamber and did not hear the amendment read. I should like to have it read.

Mr. THOMAS. I will read the amendment. I shall modify it to include a suggestion made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] regarding people representing the Red Cross and similar associations. The amendment, as drawn, provides:

The provisions of this act shall not apply to leases to tenants who are not actual residents of the District, who are not employees or officers of the Government, nor Members of the Congress, and who have no business actually requiring their presence in the District.

Mr. GALLINGER. The amendment is somewhat different from what I had imagined.

Mr. THOMAS. It clearly eliminates the class of people to whom the Senator refers.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, if the Senator will permit me one other question, does the Senator think we ought to go to the extent of disturbing any citizen—a law-abiding man or woman—who is living in the District?

Mr. THOMAS. I think the Senator from New Hampshire misunderstands the purpose of the amendment. The purpose of the amendment is to exempt such persons entirely from the operation of the bill. We should not legislate concerning people of that character who are here; let the ordinary conditions apply to them; let us confine the bill, in other words, to actual employees and officers of the Government, members of the Red Cross, and similar associations, and provide in the bill that leases held by people who have no business here shall go right on as they have gone on before. I think the Senator and I are in entire accord.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am inclined to think so, from the statement the Senator has just made.

Mr. THOMAS. And unless this amendment is inserted that class of people will be just as amenable to the drastic provisions of this proposed law as will be all other people.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If I understand the amendment of the Senator from Colorado, it seems to me that it will probably cause new difficulties or increase those already existing more than it will relieve the situation. For instance, there are a great many people in the District of Columbia who have no business here, I agree with the Senator from Colorado, and I wish some way could be provided that would induce such people to stay away from here, but they are here. Now, if they are not subject to the provisions of the bill—and many of them care nothing about that; they do not care to be subject to them—they will pay any price that is asked of them; and it seems to me that it would lessen the chances of the real clerks, of those who have real business here, because the landlords and apartment owners will prefer to lease their property to those who are not connected with the Government, and therefore not subject to the limitations of the bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, Mr. President, of course, there is that danger. On the other hand, I know of at least two landlords who will refuse to extend leases now in existence to that class of people. I think that this amendment is one that should be inserted in the bill. I do not care to discuss it further; I will submit it to a vote.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I confess that I do not understand the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I am sure that that is my fault.

Mr. LODGE. If it bears the interpretation which the Senator last gave to it, I think I am in accord with it, but it does not seem to me to read in that way.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think it can bear any other interpretation. I will read it again.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator has not an extra copy of it. I think it ought to be printed.

Mr. THOMAS. It reads:

The provisions of this act shall not apply to leases to tenants who are not actual residents of the District, who are not employees or officers of the Government, nor connected with the Red Cross, nor Members of Congress, and who have no business actually requiring their presence in the District.

I hope the Senator will be still more astonished.

Mr. LODGE. It says it shall not apply to people not residents of the District. Therefore it applies to residents of the District.

Mr. THOMAS. No; it does not. It says the provisions of the bill shall not apply to tenants who are not actual residents of the District.

Mr. LODGE. They are an exempted class?

Mr. THOMAS. The actual residents are exempted, of course.

Mr. LODGE. I thought, as the Senator read the amendment, that persons who were not actual residents were the ones exempted.

Mr. THOMAS. They are the only ones who have leases, so far as I know; they certainly constitute a large part of that class.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator mean that the leases are held only by persons not residents of the District of Columbia?

Mr. THOMAS. No; I think that a great majority of the leases, however, are held by nonresidents of the District, both in the service and out of the service of the Government.

Mr. LODGE. I still do not see just who is exempted and who is affected by the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. The purpose of the amendment is to confine the operation of the bill entirely to employees of the Government, to Members of Congress, and to those having business which actually requires their presence in the city. I do not think this bill ought to go any further; in other words, the war powers of the Government ought not to expend themselves upon a lease between a citizen of Boston not an employee of the Government and his landlord here in the city.

Mr. LODGE. I think that is right, as I understand it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Will the Senator read the first line of his amendment again?

Mr. THOMAS. I will:

The provisions of this act shall not apply to leases to tenants who are not actual residents of the District, who are not employees or officers of the Government, nor connected with the Red Cross, nor Members of the Congress, and who have no business actually requiring their presence in the District.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, assume, by way of illustration, that residents of Ohio or Massachusetts are here temporarily as Members of Congress or in some other capacity or are here engaged in legitimate business, and so forth, does the Senator construe his amendment so that it would not apply to cases of that kind?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly. If an employee of the Government needs shelter, the bill is designed to give it to him within his means; and that applies, as the bill is drawn, to everybody whether employees of the Government or not. The purpose of my amendment—it may not accomplish it—is to limit the bill to those for whom the Government should act or to whom it owes a duty to protect.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a further question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. I realize that this is rather drastic legislation, but it does seem to me that we ought not to have two classes of tenancies here. Either this bill is right or it is wrong; and if we are to have legislation of this kind, it should apply to all tenancies within the District or it should not. I am afraid that we would involve this matter a good deal if we should attempt to distinguish, as the Senator does, if I understand properly his amendment, between different classes of tenants.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think the Government has any business in the exercise of its war powers to interfere with contracts between outsiders, neither party to such contract having any connection with or relation to the Government.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, Mr. President, as a general proposition, I agree with the Senator, but if we are going to divide tenancies into classes and are going to permit the increase of rentals to one class of tenancies, it is going indirectly to affect the other class of tenancies, and I should doubt the wisdom of that.

Mr. THOMAS. No, Mr. President; I think if it results in increase of rents to one class of tenancies, that class will leave the city. That is exactly what they ought to do, and, to be perfectly frank, that is the underlying motive which caused me to prepare and offer this amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator from Massachusetts will pardon me, what I am fearing is that the tendency will be to increase the rentals of those who are in the District on legitimate business.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, the Senator's bill is inoperative. I do not think that this amendment would make it so.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the point I wish to make in reference to what the Senator from Ohio has said, is that it seems to me his argument is that the Government ought to step in and protect the tourist or the man who comes here and uses Washington as a winter resort. I have no objection in the world to his coming here, but why should he have governmental protection under a war power and have his rent kept low? There is some excuse, of course, in the case of Government employees, although it is a very poor one.

Mr. POMERENE. With all due respect to the view which the Senator from Massachusetts has expressed, I am not concerning myself about the tourist; but it is the tourist who has come here and has paid the fabulously high rents who has been in part responsible for the increase in rent to those generally here. It seems to me that if we are going to control this situation, we have got to adopt some rule which will apply equally to all.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator's knowledge is much wider than mine, but the fabulously high rents which I have heard being paid in every instance were paid by somebody holding an appointive office under the Government.

Mr. POMERENE. That is true in a good many instances.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I interrupt the Senator from Ohio?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado has the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I wish to suggest a point to the Senator from Ohio in line with his thought. Suppose that the amendment of the Senator from Colorado were adopted, and suppose that two people come to the city of Washington, one a nonresident without any business here and the other a Government employee. Now, the landlord is restricted, so far as his rent is concerned and can not increase it beyond a certain amount, but if the restriction does not apply to the tourist, who is going to get the rooms?

Mr. POMERENE. That is a very pertinent inquiry.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The object of this bill is to provide quarters for people who are needed here. Now, it seems to me that this is an invitation to rent these rooms to people who have no business here, because the landlord is under no restriction.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if this bill is to be effective, that situation can be met by the Government, which is given the power to take that home, if needed, for its own employees.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. KELLOGG. Without considering the question of the power of the Government, which is, of course, a very grave question, there are thousands of employees living in Washington——

Mr. THOMAS. Tens of thousands.

Mr. KELLOGG. Or tens of thousands, who are not in the employ of the Government, but who are absolutely necessary to the maintenance of the establishments of those who are in the employ of the Government and to running the city.

Mr. THOMAS. Then they are the families of Government employees, and they are protected by this bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. No; they are not the families of Government employees. They are employees in the stores, and so on.

Mr. THOMAS. They live here.

Mr. KELLOGG. They may live here or they may live outside of the District and do business here.

Mr. THOMAS. If that is the case, then my amendment is so drawn as to exempt them from the operation of the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Possibly it is.

Mr. THOMAS. Or, at least, that is what it is intended for.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Colorado that I quite misapprehended the purport of his proposed amendment, and after the explanation which the Senator has made, I am very cordially in favor of it. I think it is a good amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I am ready to submit it, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Colorado to the amendment of the committee.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be inserted on page 16, line 9, after the word "final"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, line 9, after the words "shall be final," it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That if the landlord or lessor be not satisfied with the orders, findings, or decisions of the board of rent appeals, he shall have the right to begin suit in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia against the tenant for such modification of said orders, findings, or decisions, or for such further sum as he may deem himself entitled to, and if said tenant be not satisfied with said orders, findings, or decisions, or if he shall claim that the rent paid by him has been excessive, he shall have the right to begin suit in said court against the landlord or lessor for such modification of said orders, findings, or decisions, or for such excess rent, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the said Supreme Court of the District of Columbia to hear and determine all such controversies, and said orders, findings, and decisions shall be prima facie evidence of the correctness and reasonableness thereof and of the rent charges so fixed and of the facts therein contained.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if that be agreed to, ought not the words "which decision shall be final" be stricken out? If it is final, I do not see how they can proceed in court.

Mr. POMERENE. It is final so far as the administrative machinery provided in this bill is concerned, and then we say, "Provided, however, that each shall have the right of review." That is the purpose of it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, I presume it is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "act," on page 9, line 2, it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect or bring within the scope of this act properties wherein, during the period of its limitations, the character of the same has been changed or converted from dwelling to business use.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have to leave the city this afternoon, and I want very much to have a short executive session before going. If the Senator does not object——

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator allow a vote to be taken on this amendment? I think it will not be debated.

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not quite understand the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that it will go to conference at best, and if it is not right the Senator can whip it into shape. I think it is an important matter. I view it so.

I will say to the Senator that there are buildings that on the 1st day of October, 1917, were dwellings. They have been entirely changed since that time and made into business property—stores, and that sort of thing. If only the same rentals should be allowed for buildings that have been converted into stores that were allowed when the buildings were residences, great injustice might be done.

Mr. POMERENE. I think the Senator perhaps does not fully appreciate the fact that discretionary power is given to the administrator here, as well as to the rent appeals board, so that they can take complete charge of that situation and regulate those rates. There can not be any doubt at all about that, I am quite sure, if the Senator will read the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have read the bill pretty carefully, and this matter was called to my attention by a party who, I think, understands the situation. The amendment is an important one. If the Senator will not oppose it and will let it go into the bill, the Senator can strike it out in conference if he wishes, and I will not make any contention in regard to it.

Mr. POMERENE. With that understanding, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I had intended to offer another amendment, but I will yield now to the Senator from North Carolina if I may be permitted.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am told that the probabilities are that this matter can be disposed of in a few minutes, and I will not interpose the motion just now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of line 3, page 15, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a comma and the following words:

And who is not engaged, directly or indirectly, in the business of buying, selling, leasing, or renting real estate in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, for the time being I will let that amendment remain in abeyance and offer another amendment which I intended to offer.

On line 2, page 15, after the word "appoint," I move to insert the words "to be confirmed by the Senate," so that this rent administrator shall be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. We have no objection to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer that amendment first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, I offer the other amendment. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that it simply prevents the appointment of a man who is in the real estate business, which I think is an important matter.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, I did not so understand it. I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to make a suggestion to the chairman of the committee. On page 11, lines 10 and 11, should not the word "no," in line 10, be stricken out and the word "such" inserted, and then the word "not" inserted after the word "case," so that it would then read:

So that the rent shall in such case not exceed 7 per cent.

It seems to me that we have a contradiction there. We provide that the rents charged shall be on the basis of 7 per cent of a value which is the assessment for taxation, plus 50 per cent, making 105 per cent. When that basis as it is now fixed by the the assessor is changed, we provide that the rent shall in no event exceed 7 per cent. That means only where the basis as fixed by the assessor has been changed.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand that it is not the Senator's purpose to change the provision, but simply to improve the language.

Mr. KENYON. To improve the language and to get rid of the apparent conflict.

Mr. POMERENE. I see no objection to that.

Mr. KENYON. Then, I move to strike out, on line 10, page 11, the word "no" and insert the word "such," and after the word "case" and before the word "exceed," on the same line, I move to insert the word "not," so that the lines will read:

So that the rent shall in such case not exceed 7 per cent per annum on the actual value of the property.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that improves it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I move to strike out, on page 12, line 13, beginning with the word "Provided" and going to the end of the section, and to insert in lieu thereof the matter which I send to the desk. In order to explain it, I will say that in my judgment it is practically the same provision, except that it is phrased better than the one to which the committee agreed originally. I call the attention of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] to it particularly, because of his knowledge of that proviso.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 13, after the word "act," it is proposed to strike out the proviso down to and including the word "act," on line 19, and to insert:

and all remedies at law or in equity of the lessor based on any provision in any oral or written agreement or written lease that the same shall be determined or forfeited if the premises shall be sold are hereby suspended while this act shall be in force; and every purchaser shall take the conveyance of premises subject to the rights of all tenants in possession thereof under the provisions of this act.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Delaware to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not desire to say anything if the amendment is to be adopted. If it is likely to be rejected, I have something to say.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I now desire to offer the amendment, somewhat modified, which I offered yesterday afternoon.

On page 13, line 22, I move to strike out all after the word "rental," the first word on line 22, down to and including the word "furnished," on line 5 of page 13, and to insert in lieu thereof the following: "for the furniture, in addition to the rental for the real estate, not exceeding 30 per cent of the value of such furniture," so that it will read:

That when the real estate is rented furnished the rent administrator shall authorize a fair and reasonable rental for the furniture in addition to the rental for the real estate, not exceeding 30 per cent of the value of such furniture.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] suggested 25 per cent as being perfectly fair. I have made it a little higher than that. I certainly think that the landlord ought not to charge for the furniture which he places in any one of these apartments, in addition to what he would charge for the unfurnished apartment, a sum greater than 30 per cent of the value of the furniture. That would practically pay for the furniture in three years. As the section now stands, as was stated yesterday, it is rather a suggestion to the administrator that if the apartment is furnished the landlord may charge in one instance not exceeding 100 per cent more than the rental unfurnished, and in the other instance mentioned in the bill 50 per cent more, and this without reference to the value or character of the furniture employed.

As stated yesterday, I think that in the case of the average one-living-room apartment, which consists of a small living room with a bed couch which may be folded up, a bathroom, a kitchenette, and a single closet, the furniture ordinarily would not exceed in value about $60, even if purchased new, and many of these apartments are furnished with secondhand furniture, which probably did not cost more than half of that. That being the case, taking an apartment that rents, we will say, for $30 unfurnished, which such an apartment certainly ought to rent for, to allow them to put in $60 worth of furniture and charge $60 per year additional for it because it is furnished seems to me to be so unjust that there is no excuse for it. It certainly does open up a wonderful opportunity for the landlord to say to his tenant who has furnished a room, "I can make a great deal more out of this room if I furnish it myself." The tenant can not go anywhere else, and must sell to the landlord the little furniture that he or she may have for whatever he or she can get out of it, because possibly there would be no other place in town where he or she could find an unfurnished apartment.

It does seem to me that this amendment is carefully guarded, because in every instance it will leave to the rent administrator the right to determine what is a reasonable and just rental for the furniture which is placed in a room.

I hope the Senator in charge of the bill will accept the amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. Will the Senator kindly read the amendment again?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will read it as it would read when amended.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER (reading)—

SEC. 7. That when the real estate is rented furnished the rent administrator shall authorize a fair and reasonable rental for the furniture in addition to the rental for the real estate, not exceeding 30 per cent of the value of said furniture.

Mr. HOLLIS. The committee considered this matter very carefully. We had testimony about it. The Senator's amendment proposes not exceeding 30 per cent on the value of the property?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not exceeding 30 per cent on the value of the furniture, not of the property.

Mr. HOLLIS. Of course, the value of the furniture is a very difficult thing to fix. The amendment does not say the value new, or the selling value, or what value. Under the bill as drawn, the rent administrator can not allow more than twice as much for a furnished apartment as for the same apartment unfurnished, and he is to fix a reasonable value. I have in mind the case of an apartment that rented for $60 unfurnished, and it was furnished at a cost of $1,000, and under the Senator's proposition $300 could be charged for it. That might be too much. I agree with the Senator that whatever we put in as a limit will probably be fixed as the value. There will be special reasons in every case brought to the administrator. We inquired carefully and we found that it is the usual rule in the District to charge twice as much for a furnished apartment as is charged for the same apartment unfurnished.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not see the chairman of the committee present, but I think he has an understanding with the Senator from Ohio that the unfinished business shall be temporarily laid aside pending the consideration of the rent bill. Therefore I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HOLLIS. In renting furnished apartments the income on the amount invested is not a fair measure of the value, because the superintendence, the looking after the furniture, the risk of its being damaged, is a large item. In this city there are many women who have been left without support but who had furniture, and they make it a business of renting apartments, furnishing them, and they actually get their living out of what comes to them for the rent of their furniture in that way. That is not for the return on their investment, it is for the trouble and the time it takes to see that things are kept in order and that the public is served. I hardly feel that 30 per cent return would be enough in some cases, and in other cases it might be too much. It may be that the Senator is right.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am afraid the Senator does not understand the amendment. It simply provides in effect that such charges shall be made on the basis of what is just and fair for the unfurnished apartment, and then the 30 per cent is in addition for the furniture that may be used by the landlord.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; I understand it. It may be that the Senator is right. I am merely stating what considerations moved the subcommittee in fixing it this way. They thought it would be fair to all concerned.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me explain it to the Senator. I am not attempting to protect those who are able to pay enormous prices, who wish to remain in the city for only a short time, but the vast number of tenants are clerks. Those clerks occupy apartments that consist, as I have stated, as a rule of only one living room, a small kitchenette, a closet, and a bathroom, and in many instances there will be two living in such a small apartment. The next class is where there are two living rooms, where the occupant can have a separate bedroom and then a folding couch in the living room. That constitutes probably 75 or 80 per cent of all the apartments.

The Senator has suggested himself that if we fix a limit ordinarily that limit will be regarded as expressing the intent of Congress rather than any lower sum; and when you say that you fix a limit where the charges for furnishing, irrespective of the character of the furniture shall be only 100 per cent, when, in other words, they can double the rent on those small apartments, the Senator will see that it opens up a wonderful opportunity for every one of this tenant class of landlords to say "instead of accepting a reasonable rent for an unfurnished apartment and an additional rent for the real value of the furniture, I can impose 100 per cent and 500 per cent, according to whether the building was constructed prior to October 1, 1917, or after that date."

Now, this provides for a reasonable return. They have no right to charge more than 30 per cent for the use of the ordinary furniture in those buildings. The furniture will last almost forever, and if they get 30 per cent on their investment for furniture in addition to their 7 or 8 per cent on the value of the room exclusive of the furniture, they certainly ought to be satisfied. I have put a limit here so that it can not run above 30 per cent on the value of the furniture. I hope the amendment will pass, because I am sufficiently well acquainted with the methods used and the charges that are made to know that there will be a great amount of imposition upon the tenants if they are compelled to pay 50 or 100 per cent more simply because the rooms happen to be furnished.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I am not quite sure, in view of the statement the Senator has just made, whether I have his amendment correctly in mind. Do I understand that the increased rent for the furnished room shall be 30 per cent of the amount of the rent or 30 per cent of the value of the furniture?

Mr. McCUMBER. Thirty per cent of the value of furniture per year, so that if an apartment rented for $30 and then there was put in furniture that amounted to $60, as 30 per cent of $60 would be $18, the landlord could not charge more than $18 in addition on account of furnishing it with $60 worth of furniture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to invite the attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to some of the provisions of section 5. I want to say that I am in sympathy with the general purposes of the bill, but there are two or three features of section 5 that seem to me to be unnecessarily drastic. Permit me to read section 5 in order that I may lead up to the particular provision:

That no judicial order for the recovery of possession of any real estate, now or hereafter held or acquired by oral or written lease, or for the ejectment or dispossession of a tenant therefrom, shall be made, and all leases thereof shall continue so long as the tenant continues to pay rent at the agreed rate, or as it may be modified under the provisions of this act—

That is parenthetical, as I understand it—and performs the other conditions of the tenancy—

Now comes the part to which I wish to call especial attention—except on the ground that the tenant has failed to take reasonable care of the premises, or has committed waste, or has been guilty of conduct which is a nuisance or amounts to a disturbance of the peace of adjoining or neighboring occupiers or a violation of law—

So far I have no particular objection to the provisions of section 5, because those are conditions that would be inserted in an ordinary lease, and if a judgment or an order for possession was sought it would be some violation or breach of one of the conditions of the lease, and this may be found, expressed or implied, in the ordinary lease. But now comes this provision—

or that the premises are reasonably required by a landlord for the occupation by himself or his family while in the employ of or officially connected with the Government.

Then follows the amendment added this morning on motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. After the word "Government," it is proposed to insert "or has been disposed of to a bona fide purchaser for his own occupancy." It seems to me that those two clauses, the one in the original bill and the amendment of the Senator from New York, work an unnecessary hardship.

Here is a landlord who may have leased the premises for one, two, three, or five years, as the case may be, and simply on the assertion now that he is in the employ of the Government or is officially connected with the Government he can bring his action for the possession of the premises. Likewise under the amendment of the Senator from New York, if he has become a purchaser of the premises in good faith and is employed by the Government, he can bring an action for ejectment, or I do not know just what the practice would be here in the District, for the possession of those premises.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that a landlord owning a building he can lease and has leased for a term of years ought not, on the mere assertion that he is now an employee of the Government, be allowed to dispossess his tenant or obtain an order of dispossession or ejectment from the premises; that as a landlord he may be as well able or better able to provide himself with other premises for his occupancy during the time or temporarily than to oust a tenant who is in possession under a lease of the premises.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Of course he can only dispossess under the provisions of the bill in the event that the lease has expired by its terms.

Mr. STERLING. But this does not say so.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, yes; I do not see how any other construction can be placed upon it. In the event the lease has expired he can exercise his right as a lessor, provided he needs the property for his own possession or that of his family, and provided further that he is in the employ of the Government.

Mr. STERLING. Then I think the words ought to be inserted to make that plain. I thought of offering an amendment to that effect.

Mr. POMERENE. I am quite sure that that was the intention of the committee, but if there is any doubt about it we would be very glad to have it made perfectly clear. I believe if the Senator will read it again he will find that it is plain.

Mr. STERLING. I read it somewhat with that in view and thought of words that ought to be added as an amendment of the provision. If I may be allowed, I will say to the Senator from Ohio, I will try and prepare an amendment that will meet the situation, and later offer it.

Mr. POMERENE. Speaking for myself, I have not had any doubt as to what was meant; but I, of course, have very great respect for the Senator's judgment as a lawyer.

Mr. STERLING. These words are very general, and there are no words preceding these two clauses, nor are there words following the two clauses that lead to the inference that it applies only to those cases where the lease has expired.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to suggest to the Senator from South Dakota that possibly these words might cover his desire as to a change in the amendment. If the Senator will turn to page 11, line 24, strike out what occurs after "except" down for some lines—the Senator will understand as I read—and insert in lieu thereof the words:

And perform the other conditions of the tenancy—

Then go on, "which are not inconsistent herewith unless the tenant has committed waste or has been guilty on the premises of conduct which constitutes or amounts to a breach of the peace or of a misdemeanor or of a crime, or that the premises are necessarily required by a landlord or bona fide purchaser for occupation either by himself or his wife, children, or dependents while he is in the employ of or officially connected with any branch of the Government, or where the property has been sold to a bona fide purchaser for his own occupancy."

Would that cover the view of the Senator?

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Delaware I hardly think that it would, or that it would make it quite plain. If the Senator will permit me, I think of words now and the place at which they might be inserted which would make the provision clear. The suggestion I would make is this: In line 3, after the word "or," insert "the lease having expired, that the premises are reasonably required."

Mr. POMERENE. In what line?

Mr. STERLING. In line 3, page 12, after the word "or," so as to read "or the lease having expired, that the premises are reasonably required by a landlord for the occupation," and so forth.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota offer that as an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. STERLING. I offer it as an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, in line 13, page 9, after the words "equal to," I move to strike out the word "seven" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eight," and to make a similar amendment applying to any other place in the bill where that change would have application.

Mr. President, my purpose in making that motion is that I think a 7 per cent rate, even having in mind the purposes of this bill, is too low to prevent a hesitation on the part of builders in continuing construction or undertaking new construction. Of course, the Senate does not intend that there shall be anything done which will tend to decrease new building undertakings. The bill not only continues during the war, but one year thereafter, and naturally there are going to be a good many vacancies, based on the present population of the District of Columbia, after the war is over; so 7 per cent, instead of being a guaranteed return, is simply a maximum return. It may be for the term of years which the law remains in force very much less than 7 per cent, and it does not seem that 8 per cent is an unreasonable maximum return on a real estate investment.

I hope the amendment will appeal to the judgment of those in charge of the legislation. I offer it without any intent to defeat its purposes—I approve of the general purposes—but I think this would add strength to it and would satisfy a condition which otherwise may not be satisfied.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not feel that I would be authorized on the part of the committee to accept that amendment. It must be borne in mind that under the provisions of the bill this is 7 per cent net; 7 per cent over and above all taxes, all assessments, all returns, all cost of maintenance, all cost of light, heat, water, elevator, and other service, and a proper charge for depreciation and nonoccupancy. It seems to me the property holders of this city will be very fairly cared for in these war times if they can get 7 per cent net.

I am not unmindful of the fact that it has been the policy of the Government to discourage unnecessary building. It is true it has become necessary to put up certain structures here in the District, and it probably will be in the future, but there are certain real estate people here who, of course, are of a speculative bent of mind. I am not finding fault with them, but they can suspend their operations without very much loss to the public for the time being. With the accommodations we have here now, after the war is ended—and may that be very soon—my belief is that a good many of these properties that were vacant during the year 1916 may again become vacant. I do not think that there is any real necessity for our exerting ourselves here to make conditions such that there will be an opportunity for speculation. I think when we have fixed 7 per cent net over and above all these expenditures we have done fairly well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the amendment of the committee.

On a division the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GALLINGER. When the joint resolution dealing with this matter was under consideration a few days ago I called the attention of the Senator from Ohio to phraseology which I thought was not happy where it says "oral or written lease." I move to insert the word "agreement" after the word "oral," so as to read "oral agreement or written lease." The same occurs in line 19, on page 11, and on line 13, page 12.

Mr. POMERENE. While I do not think it is necessary, I believe this legislation should be in harmony with the other.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; I think so.

Mr. POMERENE. We have already adopted that phraseology. So we accept, as far as we may, the proposed amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Secretary will kindly run the bill over and see if it occurs in any other place. I think it does not.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill in regard to section 13. It seems to me very blind, and I can not see what good purpose is served by it.

That any house or building not occupied by the owner or a tenant for a period of three months immediately preceding the passage of this act, or—for a period of five months after the passage of this act, may be commandeered.

Which is the alternative—

A man who has occupied a house for three months prior to the passage of this act under that provision can go away and leave it for a year, if he wants to do so. On the other hand, suppose a man comes here like Mr. Schwab or Mr. Ryan or some one recently appointed in that way. He comes here a month after the passage of the act. He is debarred from taking a house practically because he is liable to have it commandeered at any moment. He will be utterly unable to fulfill these conditions. I do not see what good purpose is served by the section in any event, but as it is now it would work great injustice, it seems to me.

Mr. HOLLIS. I was a member of the subcommittee, and I drafted this paragraph. If the Senator from Massachusetts is in doubt as to the object of it, it must be badly drawn, and it should be redrafted. I will explain why it was drafted. When we took testimony we were informed that there were hundreds of houses in the District of Columbia not occupied. I have seen many houses myself not occupied, and which have not been for a long period.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will excuse me a moment, we had testimony, and very elaborate testimony, before the committee investigating the fuel situation, on that point, and there were very few houses then unoccupied for a city of this size. We had a list presented by the Fuel Administrator.

Mr. HOLLIS. I have the exact figures here. They are found on page 131 of the testimony of Mr. Baldwin. In February and March the census was taken.

Mr. POMERENE. In March of this year?

Mr. HOLLIS. Of this year.

There were a total of 889 houses in the streets—

That is, leaving out those in the alleys not occupied; those were actually fronting on streets—of which 190 were reported as dilapidated, and so might be neglected. Out of 699 remaining, 245 were reported as being in poor repair. That left 454 houses for both white and colored, and 244 only of those were in good repair, referring to houses for white people; that is all that were left on the 3d of March last.

Then, a little later Mr. Baldwin says:

You could say that there were about 700 houses for white people on the 1st of November, as compared with 244 on the 1st of March.

Mr. LODGE. That does not differ widely from the statement of the Fuel Administrator, who said, as I recall it, that there were between four and five hundred houses available for rent still unrented. There have been something over 5,000 rented during the war.

Mr. HOLLIS. If there is a good reason why these houses should not be occupied, of course the President could not commandeer them, but it was the feeling of the committee that if there were houses that were not being occupied either by the owners or by tenants for a period of three months before the passage of this act and for a period of five months after the passage of the act, the administration should have authority to commandeer those houses and put them to war or Government use. That is the object. Does not the Senator understand that that is the effect of it?

Mr. LODGE. I understand the purpose that the Senator intends to accomplish.

Mr. HOLLIS. No; but I am asking the Senator if he does not understand that that is what this language means.

Mr. LODGE. I do not, because it seems to me to have a very different effect.

That any house or building not occupied by the owner or a tenant for a period of three months immediately preceding the passage of this act, or for a period of five months after the passage of this act.

You must fulfill one or the other of those conditions or your house is liable to be commandeered whether you are in it or not.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. It may be impossible for some people to fulfill either of the conditions I have just mentioned.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes; and if it is impossible and reasonable it would not be commandeered, but if it stands empty after the passage of this act for a period of five months they are put on notice that it may be commandeered. Why is not that thought clearly expressed? It may be the Senator does not agree with the thought, but I am interested to see——

Mr. LODGE. I do not disagree with the thought. I think the unused houses should be used.

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not understand what——

Mr. LODGE. This does not give the power to take only vacant houses; it gives the power to take occupied houses if they have not fulfilled one of those conditions. A man may be here who has taken a house in good faith and it will be absolutely impossible for him to fulfill either of those conditions.

Mr. HOLLIS. He would occupy it.

Mr. LODGE. I mean a man who comes here who has received an appointment. I believe Mr. Schwab is going to have his office elsewhere, but assume that he comes here to carry on the great work with which he has been charged, and he takes a house a month after this bill is passed; he can not possibly fulfill the conditions of this act.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then, of course, the President would not commandeer the house.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, well, it is not a question of what the President will do; it is a question of what the rent administrator will do and also a question of legislating properly. It is the rent administrator, whoever he may be, who will have the say.

Mr. HOLLIS Has the Senator from Massachusetts any suggestion to make as to how it could be more clearly expressed?

Mr. LODGE. Well, I think it ought to be so phrased that it would permit the taking of only unoccupied houses.

Mr. HOLLIS. That is the intention.

Mr. LODGE. It is now putting on a condition. See how it would work the other way. Suppose a man has occupied a house for three months up to the passage of this proposed act, and then he goes away and leaves the house closed for a year, but does not rent it. You can not touch it, because he has fulfilled one of the conditions.

Mr. HOLLIS. In my judgment, though I may be entirely wrong——

Mr. LODGE. He has fulfilled one of the conditions. There are alternative conditions.

Mr. POMERENE. May I offer a suggestion, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Would it not meet the objection which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has in mind if before the words "house or building," in section 13, line 21, the word "vacant" was inserted, so as to read:

That any vacant house or building not occupied by the owner or a tenant for a period of three months immediately preceding the passage of this act, or for a period of five months after the passage of this act—

May be commandeered?

Mr. LODGE. I should say "any vacant house or building that has not been occupied by the owner or a tenant for a period of three months." I think that would cover the most serious objection to it.

Mr. POMERENE. If I understand the thought that is in the minds of both the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], it is that the President shall have the right to commandeer, or ought to have the right to commandeer, any house vacant at the time he commandeers it, provided it has been vacant three months prior to the passage of this act or for a period of five months thereafter.

Mr. LODGE. I think that it is entirely proper, but I think that as it is now worded it might let certain people go entirely free and put other people who are occupying their houses at the mercy of the rent administrator.

Mr. POMERENE. The amendment may be redrafted in just a moment so as to meet that.

Mr. LODGE. I think it could be rephrased, so that it could be made reasonably safe, and reach the point that the Senator from New Hampshire desires to reach.

Mr. HOLLIS. I have no doubt that any court would construe it as we have been construing it here. I do not myself see that it could mean anything else. Still I may be wrong, and I want to express a definite idea in a definite way. I will address myself to it and see if I can not do so if there are any other amendments to be offered to the bill at this time.

Mr. LODGE. My main object is that the bill should be so phrased that the rent administrator shall not have the right to commandeer a house because its owner had not complied with those two conditions. The possibility of an owner complying with them will expire at the end of five months.

Mr. HOLLIS. In order to cure that, I think it can be done easily by inserting, in line 22, after the word "tenant," the words "and which has not been so occupied," so that it will read:

That any house or building not occupied by the owner or a tenant and which has not been so occupied for a period of three months.

I think that would make it clear.

Mr. LODGE. I think that the language which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] has suggested is very necessary, making it read "any vacant house."

Mr. HOLLIS. It is so described. The bill says "any house or building not occupied by the owner or a tenant." That language describes a vacant house.

Mr. LODGE. But I want to limit it to houses which are vacant at the time they are commandeered. I want to provide that the house shall be vacant when commandeered. I do not want to give the rent administrator the power to turn people out who are here on Government business or for anything else.

Mr. HOLLIS. I think the Senator from Massachusetts will agree that the words "not occupied by the owner or a tenant" mean vacant; so that if the bill reads "that any house or building not occupied by the owner or a tenant and which has not been so occupied for a period of three months," that language will cover it.

Mr. LODGE. There you come up against another very serious objection, and that is the definition of the word "occupation."

Mr. HOLLIS. That is an entirely different thing. When I propose to say "occupied by the owner or a tenant," that is what I mean.

Mr. LODGE. Suppose the owner of the house is compelled to go away for a month or something of that kind, that he leaves people in the house, who remain in it and keep it open until his return—a caretaker, if you please, or a family—does that constitute vacancy?

Mr. HOLLIS. That is exactly what we wanted to avoid, and it was phrased in that way so that it would avoid it; that a man by leaving a caretaker could not keep the house from being occupied.

Mr. LODGE. Exactly; I rather thought that was the plan.

Mr. HOLLIS. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. It is to prevent a person retaining his house, if it can possibly be done?

Mr. HOLLIS. Hardly that. I do not know why the Senator from Massachusetts should say that. But there might be houses that could be used, and the owner would prevent their being so used by putting a caretaker in. That would not be a useful purpose; that would be merely protecting the house.

Mr. LODGE. Take, for instance, this case: No doubt many Senators and Representatives occupy their houses continuously, as it has happened for a good while; but suppose Congress adjourns, as it may very well do on the 1st of July, for five months; they leave their house occupied and cared for, and yet those houses are to be taken from them, so that when they come back on public business next winter they can not have them.

Mr. HOLLIS. I anticipated exactly that objection. That is why I put in "five months after the passage of this act," so that it would take care of exactly that point.

Mr. LODGE. You can not tell when the adjournment of Congress may occur. I am not making this point in the interest of Representatives or Senators, but——

Mr. HOLLIS. Exactly the point which the Senator raises is the one which I want to meet.

Mr. LODGE. I only used that as an illustration.

Mr. HOLLIS. And I only use it as an illustration and to show that we have taken care of it.

Mr. LODGE. It occurred to other Senators; but I think you propose to put a provision in the bill which takes from anyone the house in which he lives and in which he intends to live because he may be absent from it for a short time; and you propose to allow it to be occupied by the Government or to be occupied by anyone the Government chooses. I think to take a house from its owner in that way would be high-handed and unnecessary.

Mr. HOLLIS. I understand the Senator believes that; but I want the thought very clearly expressed. That is exactly what the committee intended to do. If a house is not actually occupied by the owner or by a tenant, if it is left in charge of a caretaker for a period of five months after the passage of this act, that then it might be commandeered.

Mr. LODGE. No matter whether it is furnished or not?

Mr. HOLLIS. Exactly.

Mr. LODGE. You are going to put some tenant in a house with the furniture of the man who owns the house, who intends to live there, and who may come here on public business—you are going to give the tenant possession of the house and of the furniture that is in it——

Mr. HOLLIS. Not at all.

Mr. LODGE. For the use of Government clerks.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator from Massachusetts is entirely mistaken.

Mr. LODGE. I think there is only one way to deal with this matter, and I move to strike section 13 from the bill.

Mr. HOLLIS. The Senator from Massachusetts is entirely mistaken about the furniture, Mr. President, because there is nothing in the bill which allows any furniture to be taken. If the house is taken, the Government will take care of the furniture. That is exactly the proposition.

Mr. KENYON. I want to make a suggestion there. That is optional with the President. We shall have to trust the President.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; "trust the President to win the war."

Mr. HOLLIS. I think the issue is clearly defined. How the Senate will vote on it, of course, I have no idea, but this paragraph was drafted purposely so that a man might not leave a caretaker in charge of his house for a period of five months and go away, if that house might be useful to the Government for war purposes. I think that, in view of the Senator from Massachusetts moving to strike out the section, I shall not move to offer the amendment which I suggested, because now the issue is clearly defined, and we may as well vote on it as not.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear what the proposed amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire was, but I shall not ask him at this time until the vote is taken upon the section. Then I shall desire to ask him what was the proposed amendment. But, as I understand the amendment, it is that if Congress adjourns on March 4—that is, at the end of a short session, when it would be compelled to adjourn at that time—and there was no extra session, five months after March 4 the homes of Senators and Representatives could be commandeered.

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. And the Government could put anybody into such homes and use the furniture which is in those homes?

Mr. HOLLIS. No; they could not use the furniture; they could not take that. If the furniture were not removed it would be taken care of by the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. What would the Government do with it?

Mr. HOLLIS. It would store it. That would frequently have to be done.

Mr. LODGE. Throw it out on the street?

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not I have the floor. If so, I shall not yield to more than one Senator at a time. I am not sure as to whether or not I have the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator from New Hampshire yielded to me to ask a question.

Mr. HOLLIS. I did. My remark was not addressed to the Senator from Utah, but to other Senators who were talking about being recognized.

Of course, if a Senator or a Representative were absent and left his home, he might easily put in it a tenant who was agreeable to him. If he did not, and had good reason why he should not, the President would not commandeer it. But this is a serious time; these houses in the city of Washington are needed, and if they are vacant for a period of five months some one ought to be put in them. That would relieve the pressure on the humble homes; it would relieve the pressure all along the line. That is what the amendment is intended to do. Whether the Senate is for it or not, I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to say that, so far as my own home is concerned, I would not want to put a tenant in it for two months or three months or five months. I think that would be a very unwise thing to do. I want cases of that kind to be covered by this bill, and I was wondering whether the amendment the Senator intended to suggest would take care of just such a case. I rose to ask the question of the Senator because of the statement he had just previously made, that inasmuch as the motion was made to strike out the section he did not intend to offer the suggested amendment; but I wanted to know what the suggested amendment was.

Mr. HOLLIS. I will be very glad to inform the Senator. On page 17, line 22, after the word "tenant," it is proposed to insert the words "and which has not been so occupied."

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, that would not cover a case like the one to which I have referred.

Mr. HOLLIS. No; and it ought not to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a difference of opinion as to that.

Mr. HOLLIS. We ought not to have a law that would help Senators and Representatives and would not help other people. If we make it broad enough to protect Senators and Representatives who wish to be away for five months, we will make it broad enough to let out other people, and we ought to do so.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, we could amend that by inserting the word "vacant" before the words "house or building," which was the amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and also by inserting, after the words "not occupied by the owner," the words "or representative of the owner."

Mr. HOLLIS. That would be letting out people who can afford to maintain two or three homes and to have caretakers in them, but would not let out the man who can not afford to keep a caretaker.

Mr. LODGE. I will withdraw my motion to strike out, and offer this amendment, namely, to insert the word "vacant" before the words "house or building," and, after the words "not occupied by the owner," to insert "or representative of the owner."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, ought not that amendment to be divided?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; it can be divided.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest that it be divided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be divided. The Secretary will state the first question.

Mr. LODGE. The first question would be to insert before the word "house," the word "vacant."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the first branch of the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOLLIS. One moment. I have not the remotest idea of what the amendment is. I could not hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, line 21, before the word "house," it is proposed to insert the word "vacant," so as to read "any vacant house or building."

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the effect of that amendment will be that if the owner should go away and leave a caretaker in charge, this section would not apply to him; and it is undoubtedly, beyond everything else, the purpose to take care of people who can not afford to keep caretakers, because a house that has a caretaker in it is not a vacant house. That is why the phrase "not occupied by the owner or tenant" was used. I do not know, as I have already said, how the Senate will vote, but I want them to vote advisedly. The amendment now proposed will exempt the houses of those who are prosperous enough to maintain caretakers in them when the owners are living somewhere else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Division!

Mr. HOLLIS. I call for a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is called for.

On a division the amendment of Mr. LODGE was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Now, I move to insert after the word "owner," the words "or representative of the owner."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. KIRBY. Division!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A division is called for.

On a division, the amendment of Mr. LODGE was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I move now to strike out section 13 as amended; and I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. McNARY. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], is detained on official business.

Mr. BECKHAM. My colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], is detained by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to strike out section 13.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I called for a quorum because it seemed to me we ought to have a fuller Senate decide on section 13 of this bill after the explanation of its purpose had been given by the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS]. Section 13 provides:

SEC. 13. That any house or building not occupied by the owner or a tenant for a period of three months immediately preceding the passage of this act, or for a period of five months after the passage of this act, may be commandeered by the President of the United States for the period of the war and six months thereafter, and used for war or Government purposes, the rentals and conditions of tenancy to be fixed by the rent administrator in his discretion.

It will be seen that the section applies only within the next five months, assuming that the act passes at once; that is, after the expiration of five months it is impossible to fulfill the conditions. It appears that the purpose of it is to prevent any one who lives in Washington, and whose house and furniture are here, from going away for a period on a vacation or business, or anything you please, and leaving in charge of his house a caretaker. If he does that his furniture is to be taken out and put in a storehouse and the house commandeered for the use of anybody whom the rent administrator thinks proper. It seems to me that that is rather severe. We have inserted the word "vacant," which makes it impossible, I think, to take a house that a man rents a month after the passage of the act when he is wholly unable to fulfill the conditions. Had the word "vacant" not been put in, then, to use the illustration I have heretofore used, Mr. Schwab or Mr. Ryan or anybody who came here and took a house a month after the passage of this act, who would not and could not possibly show five months' tenancy, would be turned out under this clause. I think the word "vacant" that was put in at the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio meets that evil.

According to the junior Senator from New Hampshire, occupation must be the occupation by the owner himself. He can not leave his family in the house; he can not leave his representative there; he can not leave a caretaker there; but he must occupy it himself; otherwise, although it contains all his household goods and other property, under this clause, the rent administrator is to come in and put his furniture, his books, or whatever he has, into the street or into a storehouse and rent the house to any Government employee. It seems to me that is a pretty serious and a wholly needless power.

We are all agreed that the President should have the power, or that the rent administrator should have the power, to take vacant houses and make use of them, if they can be made use of, but to grant a power like this which could be used merely for the purposes of persecution and annoyance seems to me extremely undesirable. It is for that reason that I move to strike out section 13 of the bill, because the few Senators who were in the Senate then declined to put in the words "representative of the owner."

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the picture painted by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts is purposely lurid, and his statement contains many inaccuracies. He says, in the first place, that this section of the bill will require a house not occupied by the owner five months after the passage of the bill to be taken over. It requires no such thing. It merely permits the President to commandeer it.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say it required him, of course.

Mr. HOLLIS. I understood the Senator to so state, and I think the record will so show if the record is left the way it has been taken down. The second mistake is that the rent administrator may put anyone into a house that he sees fit. The rent administrator has no power to put anyone in a house; the President is the one who is to commandeer it and, of course, the President is the one to say who shall go into it.

An occupied house is a house which has furniture in it, so that some one is interested in seeing that it is properly taken care of. That is the definition of the courts. A house is not unoccupied that has furniture in it; and for that reason the phrase is used "not occupied by the owner or a tenant," so that it would be understood that if the house and the furniture in it were left with a caretaker it might be taken.

The bill does not provide that the rent administrator shall take the furniture out or that those who go into shall use the furniture. The President is not allowed to commandeer the furniture. If an agreement can not be made with the owner, then the furniture would have to be carefully stored for the benefit of the owner, or he might take it out himself.

If the section were amended as the Senator from Massachusetts desired to amend it, it would have applied to people who can not afford to have a caretaker in possession as the representative of the owner. We made it apply to every one who did not have his house in use for useful purposes as a residence. That is the effect of it.

It may be that the Senate does not want such a drastic provision, but the provision is plain on its face; it means that if a house hereafter is not occupied by a tenant or by the owner for a period of five months, then the President may commandeer it for war or Government purposes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, during a good deal of the discussion I have been absent in attendance upon a committee. I wish, therefore, to inquire as to the nature of the amendment providing for a day in court. Does that affect section 13?

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no; it provides for a right of review or a right of action on the application of a landlord or a lessor or a tenant to have reviewed any finding or order which may be made by the board of rent appeals.

Mr. REED. But does that apply to section 13?

Mr. POMERENE. I do not believe it is broad enough as it is written to apply to section 13.

Mr. REED. Then, Mr. President, in my opinion section 13 is clearly and absolutely unconstitutional, provided we indulge the somewhat violent presumption that the Constitution still exists.

The fifth amendment to the Constitution, with which all are familiar, and which I read only for the purpose of calling attention to its peculiar phraseology, reads, with some omissions:

> No person shall be * * * deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

That raises the question, of course, of what is just compensation. If I understand the genius of the decisions that have been rendered touching that matter, no man is held to have just compensation who is not given his day in court.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it is very clear that he would have. The Senator does not want to argue that, I think, for we would all agree with him. The President may commandeer for public use. The rentals and conditions of tenancy are fixed by the rent administrator. The orders and findings of the rent administrator are appealable to the board of rent appeals, and the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio gives an appeal from the board of rent appeals to the court; so that undoubtedly the compensation would be fixed by the court in the last resort. I think that is taken care of.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator from New Hampshire does not agree with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I made the statement that I did to the Senator from Missouri not having in mind the last clause of that sentence, which provides that the rentals and conditions of tenancy shall be fixed by the rent administrator in his discretion. Of course, under the provisions of this act, the right of appeal lies from the rent administrator to the board of rent appeals, and then a further review is provided by the courts of any order or finding of that board.

Mr. REED. I am going to accept, for the purposes of what I have to say, the conclusion that is now arrived at, that the right is reserved to appeal from the rent administrator's decrees to a court. But, Mr. President, assuming that, may I now ask another question—if it is proposed, after this property is commandeered and taken over by the Government for the Government then to rent it to private parties who will proceed to move into it and occupy it for private homes? Is the President to take it and then rent it to citizens for occupancy? That is the purpose of the amendment, is it not?

Mr. HOLLIS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Now, I assert that that is unconstitutional. That is not taking property for a public use but it is taking property for a private use.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it is expressly confined to taking it for war or Government purposes.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; they are to pretend to take it for war or Government purposes, but it is in fact to be taken over to be rented to private individuals. My friend from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] shakes his head, but the statement just made by the author of this section was that the purpose was for the President to take it, and, having taken it, then to rent it out to private individuals.

Mr. HOLLIS. For war or Government purposes.

Mr. REED. Yes; to rent it out for war or Government purposes to a private individual, and collect rent back from the private individual.

Mr. KENYON. It would have to be somebody connected with the war purposes of the Government, not private individuals.

Mr. REED. And it is provided that it shall be rented—I read the language:

> The rentals and conditions of tenancy to be fixed by the rent administrator in his discretion.

Mr. KENYON. But it must be for war purposes.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; the statement of the Senator from Iowa and the position of the author of section 13 are irreconcilable with each other and are alike irreconcilable with the Constitution. The position of the author of section 13 is that the President will take over this property and then he will rent it to a private individual, who will in turn pay rent for it. Now, the Senator from Iowa seems to be of the opinion that that transaction, by which the property of one private citizen is turned over to another private citizen without the consent of the owner of the property, can be made a war purpose by the simple finding on the part of the President that it will in some way aid the war to take one man's property and give it to another man. On the contrary, it can only be taken for a public use, when the public must have it for a public use, which is only another way of saying when the public must itself use the property taken by the public for the public. The moment the necessity for the Government to use the property ceases, the right to take the property ends. It follows that property can not be taken by the public for the purpose of renting it to private citizens for homes. Such a transaction is the taking by the Government of the private property of one citizen, not for the public use, but for the private use of another citizen. You can not succeed by such a subterfuge of words. A court will drive straight through the verbal pretense to the real purpose of the transaction.

There was a time when courts held that they could not look back of a legislative veil, and that they would accept whatever the legislature had declared as the reason for a law; but there is a new line of decisions on that point; they go to the effect that the real purpose will be looked into by a court; that a legislature will not be permitted to practice a fraud upon the Constitution or a fraud upon the law by a false declaration. But in the pending bill the purpose appears manifest, and if the authors of this measure are perfectly frank this is what they will say they mean: That a war is now on; that it is desirable for people to have houses in Washington in which to live; and that they propose to authorize a rent administrator to seize the property of any citizen who does not happen to be home at some particular time and to turn it over to some other individual who wants the house. The fortunate individual may be one of the hundreds of clerks working down in the Fuel Administrator's office or in some other similar department. When the man who owns the property, who has bought it and paid for it, who has the right to control it, returns he will be told his property was taken for war purposes, although it is occupied by a gentleman who never smelled gunpowder and who is paying rent to the rent administrator, and paying rent solely because he is occupying the property for his private use.

Mr. President, I say that if you can do that with the citizen under the pretext that it is for a war purpose, then there is nothing that the Government can not do. The Government can seize every farm in the United States, and say: We are seizing these farms for a war purpose. True, we do not intend to occupy them by any governmental activity; we merely propose to leave them to people to occupy as private farms exactly as they were occupied before we evicted the owners, but by this admirable device we will gain control over all the farms of the United States and likewise we will control the people who must live by farming. We will be able to stipulate that the Government's tenants shall sell their wheat and corn and rye and oats and barley and other products in the manner and form and at the prices dictated by some man who may have been appointed for the purpose of doing these illegal and unconstitutional things.

If the construction is correct, for which Senators contend, then the Congress can pass a law by which they can take the watch from the pocket of one citizen for the express purpose of selling it to another citizen for his private use. If this be possible, then a Government agent can be authorized to take the watch from the pocket of the Senator from Iowa and turn it over to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, could not Congress take the watch of the Senator from Iowa—they would not want it, probably; it is an Ingersoll—and turn it over to the soldier if that was essential as a war matter?

Mr. REED. The Congress of the United States could pass a law authorizing the taking of private property for a public use, and that is limited by the rule that it must be actually for a public use, but they can not take the watch of the Senator from Iowa and turn it over to the Senator from Missouri. The Senator agrees to that by the motion of his head. What are you proposing to do here? The Senator from Iowa is in the employ of the Government. The Senator from Missouri is in the employ of the Government. The Senator from Iowa states that the Government can not take his watch and give it to the Senator from Missouri, as a war measure. How, then, can they take the house of the Senator from Iowa, merely because he happens to be temporarily absent, and turn it over to the Senator from Missouri?

Your bill, sir, proposes here in the Capital of this Nation to provide that if a man is absent from his home for a given period of time his home can be taken by the President of the United States, and not used and occupied by the Federal Government for a governmental purpose, but turned over to another private citizen, to be occupied by that citizen.

I am aware that the fact that such a law will be a rape upon the Constitution will not make a bit of difference. You will pass this legislation. You will sit here and deliberately help to destroy the Constitution of the United States, that it took 6,000 years of human travail to establish, every line of which is written in the blood that has poured from the veins of patriots through the long centuries, every paragraph of which is the ultimate result of wars that have whitened the plains of Europe with the bones of men who went down to their death in the cause of human liberty. You will set aside the Constitution of the United States, that represents the tears and the prayers of all the brave men and women who have died in the cause of human right, because rents are temporarily high in Washington. You will hunt for pretexts, you will employ subterfuges, you will devise false preambles and fraudulent recitals in order that you may, if possible, cheat the Constitution and accomplish your ends, which are to bring yourselves technically within the Constitution while you are outraging its spirit; and you have the effrontery to call yourselves guardians of the Constitution!

What is there within the four corners of this amendment? In the Soviet of Russia, set up by that compound of anarchy and imbecility known as the Bolsheviki, they have had similar legislation. In Russia were wicked bankers who had money, and there was a great mass of people who said they needed it. The representatives of the needy decreed, "Open the vaults of these banks and pour forth this money; the people need it." The argument of necessity was theirs; but back of that argument of necessity in Russia was a condition that does not here exist. I refer to the fact that the money in the Russian banks had perhaps been wrung, by hard and brutal processes, from an oppressed people. They said: "We will divide up this money. We will divide up all property. We will have a carnival of loot."

Here sits the Senate of the United States. The modern reformer is among us just now. He is in the very zenith of his glory; the flood tide of his power. Rents have been raised by some Washington landlords; some rent hogs have developed—some fellows who are entitled to the contempt of all decent men because they are taking advantage of necessity; and because that is true, in order to affect a few of such cases, we will strike down the old Constitution that is and has been the sublimest bulwark of human liberty ever conceived by the brain of man. Because of a temporary annoyance confined to a few people we will do this indescribable wrong to the great cause of freedom. And why? The reasons have come out here at times in the course of this debate. There are some landlords who have raised rents. There are also some men of property who have bought homes in Washington in other years. They live here part of the time. They live in New York part of the time, or in Chicago, or elsewhere. They have really two homes, and their Washington homes are not occupied part of the year, but they are, nevertheless, their homes. They bought them. They own them. Now, the real purpose of section 13 is to take these homes and turn them over to certain other people who happen to want to occupy them. That is the real purpose; and the justification for it is that rents have been raised in Washington, not by the owners of these homes but by certain landlords who rent other property.

If it were the purpose of this amendment that the Government, in order to meet an actual necessity, should take vacant houses and occupy them for governmental purposes, the argument I am advancing would not be made; but the purpose is to take these properties from their private owners and to turn them over to some other private citizens who do not own them, under the false pretense, the fraudulent recital, that they are being "taken for war purposes." They are not being taken for war purposes, except as you may say that the Government can take every farm in the United States and say, "There is a war on, and we are going to take it, and then we are going to deliver it over to other people to do with as they see fit or as we see fit to tell them to do." That is not a war purpose. You might as well say that it is part of the war purpose for the Government of the United States to take over every clothing store in the United States, and then proceed to sell the clothing out again to private citizens. You might as well say that it is part of a war purpose for the Government of the United States to seize every law library in the United States and to proceed to rent the books to the lawyers of the United States. If you give war purposes such a scope and breadth as that, then, of course, all you have to do is to declare war and at once all property becomes subject to seizure and can be taken from its owner and handed over to another under the pretext that a war is being waged. This, indeed, is the exact doctrine of that eminent Mexican bandit, Pancho Villa, whose processes, while more direct, were not different.

Let us see where this new doctrine takes us. Let us see how far this amendment goes.

> That any house or building not occupied by the owner or a tenant for a period of three months immediately preceding the passage of this act—

And so forth, may be taken over.

Ninety days ago a man left the city of Washington because he was sick, to go to California for his health, expecting to return as soon as nature would permit. He comes back the day after to-morrow, having been gone 91 days, and he finds that the Senator from New Hampshire has legislated him out of his house and home. Now, that may be a good Socialist doctrine, it may be a good bolsheviki doctrine, it may be a good anarchist doctrine, but it is not a doctrine that I have understood to prevail where human rights were under the protection of the old Constitution. I can find some Socialist platforms that go almost to that length, but I do not think I can find one that goes quite so far. We must cross socialism with anarchy to get such an offspring.

To gain attention at such a time as this everything must be considered in its connection with the war. I therefore so conform my illustration. Imagine the case of a widow's son drafted into the Army and sent to a camp somewhere in the South; the mother knowing that her son will soon be ordered to the bloody plains of France, perhaps never to return, locks up her house in Washington and follows her darling boy to the southern camp; there she has established an abode so located that she can occasionally see her soldier son when off duty.

The boy is sent to France, the mother returns to Washington, and finds that the Senate of the United States has taken over her property, not for the Government to occupy, but for a bevy of blond-haired beauties who work in the Food or Fuel Administration, or perchance for some of the intellectual Bolsheviki who, under the direction of Mr. Creel, form public opinion in the censor department, to occupy. She also finds that the Government has fixed and is collecting a rent, thereby demonstrating the property is for the private use of the individual who pays the rent. Perhaps also she will find an individual like Fuel Administrator Weaver has taken possession of her and of other people's property—Weaver, the gentleman who left this city in the grip of winter's cold without any fuel, who issued an order closing the churches and opening the theaters on Sunday, and then hied himself to Florida, there to bask in the golden sunshine and to enjoy the sweet breezes of that salubrious climate while Washington shivered and prayed for a hot wave. A rent administrator!

Beware, my friends. You may legislate yourselves out of your own homes, those of you who have been foolish enough to buy property in Washington or have to rent it for any length of time; for, behold, the day may come when Congress again will recess for a longer period than 90 days. In that event, when you return here, you may find that some rent administrator has broken down your doors and installed a lot of tenants of his own selection. They may have kicked holes in the plaster, broken windows, and torn out the plumbing, but you can not even get a writ of ejectment against the rent administrator, because he represents the sovereign Government of the United States. You can not recover damages. All you can do is to go to the court mentioned in this bill and ask to have the rent raised.

The only time that legislation like this has been really duplicated was during the French Revolution. I said the other day, when we moved back the hands of the clock and thereby tried to arrest the march of time, that there were two or three things yet that the French revolutionists did that had been overlooked, but that our reformers would find them in a short time. They have discovered one more, and that is a means to take somebody's property, take it over to the Government—not to take it over to the Government in good faith for a governmental purpose, for none of us question that right—but to take it over for the purpose of renting it to private individuals, thus taking the property of one private citizen not for a public use but for the use and benefit of a private citizen.

That has been tried before. During the French Revolution they were a little more direct. They were also a little more frank. In the French Revolution they confiscated the estates of the nobility; they not only confiscated the real property, but they confiscated the personal property. The harridans of the streets went about wearing the finery of ladies. The unshaven reformers moved into the homes of other men. Sometimes they ordered it sold and bought it in themselves. They, too, had administrators who administered in a summary way upon the property of other people. It was this disregard for law and fundamental rights that destroyed the Republic. Those things brought "the man on horseback." Those things finally reestablished the monarchy in France, because the people came to learn that any government that made life and property secure was to be preferred to any government that plundered the people at will and that itself engaged in robbery and thievery. For, mark you, a government can be a thief as well as an individual. Just as the soul of man abhors the wretch who takes the property of another man at the point of a pistol, so does the conscience of man revolt at any government that takes from a citizen his property, except it be for a public purpose and upon just and fair compensation.

I said the other day in substance what I am going to say now, and with this I shall close what I have to say about this bill and its purpose. All over this world in every land there is a propaganda being secretly preached. It is the propaganda of anarchy and socialism coupled with anarchy. It is a propaganda that proposes to destroy rights of property. It is a propaganda that proposes to destroy the solemnity of judicial decree. It is a propaganda that proposes to set up the will of men temporarily in power as superior to the principles of constitutions and of laws. When that propaganda is in full force and effect and when it has been nurtured and aggravated by the hard industrial conditions that are certain to follow this war, when factories are closed, as they must close, and when the man who has been earning $10 a day in war times finds himself reduced to $3 or $4 a day, and realizes that he must come to a lower level of living, when, indeed, in some cases there will be actual want, when the pinch of poverty comes, this feeling of unrest will grow until it will be a thing that must be carefully and patiently dealt with.

The cry that will be upon the lips of the propagandists who will then be preaching the doctrine of the I. W. W., the doctrine of the anarchist, will be "that the rights of the people are superior to written constitutions, or courts, and to law," and they will interpret their own desires and passions as the rights of the people. In that day, which I believe will come, I hope we can say to all misguided people who may then arise the old Constitution has survived every attack; even during the stress of a great world war, though often tempted, we maintained its sacred principles; it stands now, as it always has, the citadel of human liberty. This is a government of law and not a government of mobs. This is a government of constitutions and not a government of men. This is a government based upon principle and not upon caprice and passion and venom and hatred and eager desire to rob and plunder. So we plant ourselves upon the Constitution and say that it shall be maintained.

That is the argument I hope to make. But what shall I say if the leader of the mob can hurl back in our teeth the statement, "Behold, when there was a little stress, when there was no suffering, when there was no hunger, you in the Senate of the United States treated the Constitution as a rope of sand, binding upon no one. You treated it as a worthless scrap of paper, not entitled to the decent respect even of the men who had solemnly sworn to maintain it sacred and inviolate"? What shall we say then to these people who come clamoring, declaring that the Constitution should be set aside or ignored if we ourselves have established the fatal precedent?

There never was a time in the history of this world when those who believe in established governments ought to so carefully guard the Constitution of liberty. There never was a time when this Republic, the only real republic there is on earth, ought to demonstrate to the world two things: First, that we can make war better than any monarch on earth; that we can make war better than any Kaiser, because our people's loyalty is superior to his people's slavery; that we can make war better than any despot, because the soldier who goes over the top with a cheer on his lips fights better than the man who goes over because an officer has driven him to his death; we can make war better than any monarch, because there is back of it the soul and the heart and the purpose of a people willing to die for liberty.

I want to be able to say that, and to also say that the Republic went through this war, this cataclysm of the ages, this bloody sea in which all the nations of the earth are struggling, now scarce able to keep their heads above its crimson waves, without a single human right having been impaired, with the old Constitution of the fathers maintained sacred and inviolate—holier than ever before because rebaptized in the blood of freemen. So let it continue throughout the ages, the most majestic monument man has ever erected to the divine doctrine of human liberty.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I know it is customary now to cry down anyone who raises a constitutional question, but for one I believe that infractions upon constitutional rights are not usually made boldly with that intention, but under the guise of great public necessity. I do not believe it is necessary in carrying on this great war any more than it was necessary in carrying on the War of the Rebellion to disregard constitutional rights. It is not always popular to stand for constitutional rights, especially if we happen to be protecting those who have wealth, but it is just as right to do it.

I do not wish to vote for a bill or a provision in a bill that the committee on the floor of the Senate concedes to be unconstitutional. Section 13, of course, without the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio is clearly unconstitutional, because private property can not be taken even for public use without just compensation and an opportunity to have that fixed in the courts of the land under the system of due process of law. If the amendment of the Senator from Ohio grants that right, and if the provision only goes to taking private property for a public use I concede it is constitutional.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is undoubtedly right when he asserts that Congress can not provide for taking dwellings or any other property to be rented for private use, and the most that Congress could do in any event—the decision I will briefly mention later—is to provide for the taking of vacant unoccupied property or any other property for Government offices or for housing Government employees where it is a public necessity. I do not believe that Congress can take over houses and rent them out to private individuals who are not employees of the Government whom it is the Government's duty and possibly necessity to house.

Now, as to section 13, I doubt its necessity. In any city, however overcrowded, there is bound to be from time to time a certain percentage of unoccupied property. The statistics show that the number of vacant properties since December has been reduced from something like 800 to 200 and odd.

Now, let us not forget that through all Anglo-Saxon history the laws have thrown around the home every protection possible. Do not invade that home unless it is an absolute war necessity. If it is, of course we will do it. No one here is going to hesitate to take every man's home if it is necessary for shipyards, for making munitions, or lending strength to the arm of the Nation; but I do not believe this is necessary for those purposes.

Now, let us see about some other provisions of the bill. The main feature of the bill as to the power of Congress to regulate rentals within the District of Columbia is, of course, an entirely different proposition.

For a few moments this morning I gave a little attention to the legality or constitutionality of the main feature of the bill. Aside from the question of the war power, which nobody seems to be able to define, this statute can only be sustained on the theory that it is a regulation of a business affected with the public interest, and I believe that is the theory on which the able lawyers upon the committee expect it will be sustained.

In so far as it is necessary to house all these employees of the Government and to protect them against extortion it may be an exercise of constitutional power. It is, of course, impossible for me and would be a waste of time to go over the numberless authorities involving the question of regulation of business in a discussion of a few moments in the Senate. The authorities are very largely collected in the case of Budd v. New York (143 U. S., 517). It is there laid down as a general principle:

> Under the powers of government inherent in every sovereignty "the Government regulates the conduct of its citizens one toward another and the manner in which each shall use his own property, when such regulation becomes necessary for the public good"; and that, "in their exercise it has been customary in England from time immemorial and in this country from its first colonization to regulate ferries, common carriers, hackmen, bakers, millers, wharfingers, innkeepers, etc., and in so doing to fix a maximum of charge to be made for services rendered, accommodations furnished, and articles sold." It was added: "To this day statutes are to be found in many of the States upon some or all these subjects; and we think it has never yet been successfully contended that such legislation came within any of the constitutional prohibitions against interference with private property." It announced as its conclusions that down to the time of the adoption of the fourteenth amendment it was not supposed that statutes regulating the use, or even the price of the use, of private property necessarily deprived an owner of his property without due process of law; that when private property was devoted to a public use it was subject to public regulation; that Munn and Scott, in conducting the business of their warehouse, pursued a public employment and exercised a sort of public office, in the same sense as did a common carrier, miller, ferryman, innkeeper, wharfinger, baker, cartman, or hackney coachman; that they stood in the very gateway of commerce and took toll from all who passed; that their business tended "to a common charge" and had become a thing of public interest and use; that the toll on the grain was a common charge; and that, according to Lord Chief Justice Hale, every such warehouseman "ought to be under a public regulation, viz," that he "take but reasonable toll." (Budd v. New York, 143 U. S., 517, 535–536.)

See also Brass v. Stoeser, 153 U. S., 405.

Reaffirmed in German Alliance Insurance Co. v. Kansas, 233 U. S., 309.

Now, then, if in the District of Columbia, where Congress has the power to legislate exclusively as the States may legislate within their borders, a business affected with a public interest may be regulated, the charges for the property may be fixed with one condition—that those charges are reasonable and constitute a reasonable compensation for the use of the property.

The court in one of these cases said:

The underlying principle is that business of certain kinds holds such a peculiar relation to the public interests that there is superinduced upon it the right of public regulation.

It may be, therefore, that, especially in time of war, when there is a sudden and very great influx of population in the District of Columbia, engaged in the various activities of war, that it may be necessary not only to procure means for housing the employees, but to protect them from extortion in rental charges.

I do not believe that this legislation can be sustained upon any other ground.

Now, the legislation goes a step further, and the power to enact it in that regard is at least extremely doubtful. I have become a little cautious in 40 years' experience at the bar in dogmatic statements as to the legality of legislation.

It is possible that by reason of the large percentage of the population engaged in Government work that the Congress may make the act general to all the inhabitants of the District, because to regulate the rents of employees alone would perhaps subject the balance of the inhabitants to added extortion.

I think we can admit that that is traveling a pretty long way in constitutional law. Quite likely the court would limit this act in its scope so as to make it constitutional, because it is a rule of construction that that construction shall be placed upon an act which will render it constitutional if possible. It may be with that in view the court would say that as the act is general in terms we give it the construction that it applies only to Government employees, employees engaged generally in Government work, or who are necessary to the prosecution of this great enterprise.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I merely wish to suggest to the Senator that when Congress passed the first employers' liability law relating to railroads the Supreme Court refused to do that, in that case, because the description of the employees was so general that those who were engaged exclusively in intrastate commerce were included in the term as well as those engaged in interstate commerce. I wondered if we would not run against that decision.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator is entirely correct. In that case the court did hold that, as the act was general and applied to employees who were engaged in intrastate commerce as well as interstate commerce, it was clear from the act that it was so intended, and the court held the act unconstitutional.

Mr. HARDWICK. That will be true here. The language is broad enough to include every inhabitant of the District. There would not be any way of getting out of it.

Mr. KELLOGG. The language is very broad, and it is possible that a court might say that, as this is the seat of government, as it is absolutely necessary to bring here thousands of employees to maintain the departments and to carry on the war, Congress must take charge of the entire rental conditions in this city in order not only to control the rentals of those who are actually engaged in Government work, but of various employees who are working for other people and not directly engaged in Government employment. I do not say that the act would be unconstitutional on that ground, but it at least is on the very border, and it is a question of some doubt as to whether it is wise to go that far.

I do not wish to give it as an opinion that it would be unconstitutional in that regard, but this power to fix rates, even if we concede it to be a business devoted to public use, of course is not an unlimited power. Congress has no right to fix a compensation which will not yield a fair income upon the property devoted to public use. This, of course, has been settled by the authorities so many times that it is unnecessary for me to repeat it to the lawyers of the Senate. Two cases I might briefly mention—an early case in Minnesota which went to the Supreme Court of the United States, known as the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway v. Minnesota (134 U. S., 418), and Reagan v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. (154 U. S., 362).

In the former case, a Minnesota statute which gave the Minnesota Railway Commission absolute power to fix rates and made the decision of that commission final, the court held that statute was unconstitutional.

In the Reagan case, the statutes of Texas provided that if the railroad company was dissatisfied it might file a petition in a court of competent jurisdiction in Texas against the commission. The court held the statute constitutional.

It is undoubtedly true that fixing of tariffs or rentals of property devoted to public use is a legislative power, subject to the right of the owner or lessor of the property to go into a competent jurisdiction to review the reasonableness of such charge. The conclusions of the courts generally are very clearly stated by the circuit court of appeals of the eighth circuit, in the case of Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission (164 Fed., 646):

1. Neither Congress nor any legislative or administrative board acting by its authorization can competently establish rates for the transportation of property in interstate commerce that will not admit of the carrier earning such compensation for the service rendered as under all the circumstances is just and reasonable to it and to the public, for that would be depriving the carrier of its property without due process of law, and would be taking its property for public use without just compensation, in violation of the fifth amendment to the Constitution.

2. Power to determine and prescribe what are just and reasonable maximum rates to be charged in interstate commerce is, in a limited way, conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission by existing statute law; but as the commission acts only as a legislative or administrative board and not judicially (Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Myatt (C. C.), 98 Fed., 335, 344), its determination or action does not and can not preclude judicial inquiry into the justness and reasonableness of the rates within the meaning of the constitutional guaranty, for that is a judicial question.

3. To be just and reasonable, within the meaning of the constitutional guaranty, the rates must be prescribed with reasonable regard for the cost to the carrier of the service rendered and for the value of the property employed therein; but this does not mean that regard is to be had only for the interests of the carrier or that the rates must necessarily be such as to render its business profitable, for reasonable regard must also be had for the value of the service to the public. And where the cost to the carrier is not kept within reasonable limits, or where for any reason its business can not reasonably be so conducted as to render it profitable, the misfortune must fall upon the carrier, as would be the case if it were engaged in any other line of business.

6. The statute under which the Interstate Commerce Commission derives its power to prescribe rates at all unequivocally recognizes, and, if there be need therefor, it plainly declares, that the circuit courts, sitting in equity, are vested with jurisdiction to entertain, hear, and determine suits to compel obedience to orders of the commission prescribing rates and also suits to annul or enjoin the enforcement of such orders. This is shown (a) by the provision in section 15 (act Feb. 4, 1887, ch. 104, 24 Stat., 384 (U. S. Comp. Stat., 1901, p. 3165), as amended by act June 29, 1906, ch. 3591, sec. 4, 34 Stat., 589 (U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp., 1907, p. 900)).

I understand that the object of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio was to make sure that if the rent administrator fixed the compensation unreasonably low and denied to the owner of the property reasonable compensation so that it would be a taking of his property without compensation, he should have his day in court, because it is perfectly clear that to take the use of property without paying just compensation is just as much taking property as to take the physical property.

As to the main features of the bill, I shall not stop to discuss them. I do not believe generally in price-fixing legislation. We have not been very fortunate in the experiments we have tried since the beginning of the war. I do not believe they would naturally encourage us to extend the field of activity in this regard. I have not discussed those acts, but I think it is pretty evident to everyone that, generally speaking, they have been failures; that in a great country like ours the laws of supply and demand are sufficient. There may be exceptions, and it is claimed by reason of the extraordinary circumstances in the District of Columbia there is an exception. I shall not speak against the bill on that phase. The members of the committee have given it very careful consideration and I have not; but I thought I should at least submit these few observations upon the constitutionality of the bill, because I do not like to vote for a bill or any clause in a bill which I know or believe to be unconstitutional.

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTION.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, in to-day's final edition of the Washington Times there appears a facsimile statement of Mr. Henry Harrison Suplee, of the Military Intelligence Section, upon the front page. It concerns Mr. Gutzon Borglum, about whom and from whom much has been recently heard. I shall not read the statement of Mr. Suplee, but refer to it, because I feel it my duty, in view of its unexpected appearance, to give the public all documentary matter in my possession relating to the connection of Mr. Gutzon Borglum with his so-called investigation of the aviation program.

I do this, Mr. President, primarily because, in view of the prominence that has been given to Mr. Borglum's charges, it is due to the country that the facts embodied in these documents be known. I do it also because I took occasion to say, during the discussion of Mr. Borglum's statement last week, that I had received information regarding that gentleman's personal activities in conjunction with his alleged public service which reflected upon his motives and tended to discredit his assertions.

Copies of certain correspondence relating to this subject were given to me this morning, which contain the facts upon which I founded that reflection. I had no intention of bringing the matter to the notice of the Senate to-day, possibly not at all, but the unexpected appearance of the statement of Mr. Suplee in a prominent newspaper requires that I should ask consent to insert these documents in the RECORD, including that of Mr. Suplee, before the adjournment of the Senate.

With this preliminary statement, Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD without reading: First, copy of a letter from Mr. Gutzon Borglum of the 14th of September, 1917, to Gen. Squier; second, copy of a letter from Mr. Borglum to the President of the United States of date September 16; third, copy of a letter from Mr. Borglum to the Secretary of War, September 16, 1917; fourth, copy of a letter dated August 30, 1917, from Mr. Borglum to Prof. W. F. Durand, chairman of the National Aeronautic Advisory Committee; fifth, copy of letter from Mr. Borglum to Prof. Durand of date the 4th day of November, 1917; sixth, copy of a letter to Mr. Borglum from Dr. Durand of date the 17th of November, 1917; seventh, copy of a telegram to Dr. Charles D. Walcott from one C. H. Peabody, of date May 3, 1918; eighth, a photographic copy of the statement of Mr. Henry Harrison Suplee appearing in this afternoon's Times; ninth, a letter from Mr. M. W. Mix, representing the Dodge Manufacturing Co., of Indiana, to myself, bearing date the 10th of May, 1918; tenth, a statement of Mr. Kenyon Mix, of the same company, containing a résumé of his association with Mr. Borglum, and bearing date 17th of January last. This statement is not signed. Eleventh, a letter from Mr. Kenyon W. Mix to Mr. Hardesty, dated Ithaca, N. Y., the 30th day of January, 1918; twelfth, a photographic copy of a telegram from Mr. Borglum to Mr. Mix, dated December 31, 1917, together with a photographic copy of Mr. Borglum's card; thirteenth, copy of a letter of Hugo C. Gibson, referred to in the statement of Mr. Mix and addressed to Kenyon Mix, of date the 31st of December, 1917; thirteenth, a photographic copy of a communication of the 4th of January, 1918, of the Dodge Manufacturing Co. to Mr. Gutzon Borglum, but which was never mailed; also a photographic copy of a telegram to Mr. Kenyon Mix from Mr. Borglum on the 4th day of January, 1918; fourteenth, second telegram between the same parties, on the 6th of January, 1918; fifteenth, copy of telegram, Borglum to Mix, dated January 7, 1918, together with a diagram which I think is designed to outline the assemblage of buildings composing or to compose a manufacturing plant. Lastly, a photographic copy of an autograph letter from Mr. Gibson to Mr. Mix of January 16, 1918.

I do not care to take the time of the Senate now to discuss the merits or the demerits of the matters to which this correspondence relates, but I am satisfied that their contents will fully sustain my assertion of last week that Mr. Borglum's charges against the aviation program, whether true or not, come from a source that is wholly unworthy of credit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STAMFORD, CONN., September 14, 1917.

Brig. Gen. SQUIER,
Chief Signal Corps, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GEN. SQUIER: In connection with the aeroplanes that I am making, I have developed an air brake which I intended for their exclusive use. Extraordinary as it may seem, I have created an excellent working model of a brake that can be used, built, or applied on any aeroplane. It is flexible and reliable, breaks the speed of the machine to any extent you wish without interfering with its power. It acts as a stabilizer, increases enormously the safety of the machine, and forms a powerful right and left control and protects any car, even the British narrow-bladed war machine or the swift, heavy Italian triplane absolutely from any danger in alighting or making a landing. The brake responds instantly to the control and controls instantly the plane and enables the aviator to bring his car to any speed and sustain it without interfering with the engine or, in other words, his power.

It is probably not claiming too much to say this invention is the only one in the field making any claim as a speed regulator, and after innumerable experiments I venture to say it is the only principle applicable to a swift, gliding plane, without changing or interfering in the least with its definite function as a glider, accomplishing for the present aeroplane, in effect, the long coveted feat of hovering. The brake has no connection with the power or the life of the machine; it is applied definitely to the control of the load.

If this interests you, I shall be glad to hear from you.

Yours, very truly,

GUTZON BORGLUM.

P. S.—I have developed many models of my tube plane shown to you and Col. Williams at the Shoreham. I have three standard forms—forms which, as I understand, the needs of war should be standardized—a small, swift, high-powered, quick-turning, safe scouting car for two men; a long (48 feet) fighting car, carrying machinist, gunman, and aviator, can carry from three to five hundred gallons of gas, has 800 feet of lifting surface, and has less head resistance than the standard plane of to-day, and wastes none of its propeller power; it will weigh, as near as I can figure, about seventeen fifty and carries two engines.

The third is a double tube or battle plane for bombardment, carrying 2,200 lifting feet, less than double the head resistance of the single fighting car; has cabin and engine room between the tubes 22 feet long. Of course, I need not tell you it can carry four engines, a great quantity of gas and high explosives, and it should have two aviators, two gunners, two machinists for relay service. It should cross great distances and carry supplies for its fleet of smaller cars, which can readily land on its back and get away.

I have perfected the major problems of each of these cars and believe no time should be lost in converting our aeronautics into aerodynamics. I think three to four hundred million flung to principles, which are at best but swallows and flycatchers and are instruments which kill mainly those who use them, is about enough, and the exploitation of the gliding kite (the plane), which avoids the element it assumes to invade and live in, has had its day and been given its opportunity. Three years and three or more billions have been spent to exploit an instrument that has grown old before its principles are old enough to have been known. The world grabbed the plane and stopped thinking.

I will not burden you with the valuable by-products of my experiments, which include, with the air brake, a propeller which uses completely and gives the same efficiency to the dead core of air about the axle of all propellers without the screw or turbine principle. I have also a definite invention which gives the same lifting power to planes entering the air endwise, which alone will revolutionize aeronautics and add 75 per cent to safety.

Now, I have but one idea in mind in all this work, and that is to turn aeronautics of peace into aerodynamics in war—convert sniping and peeking into organized invasion with positive measurable results obtainable in at least 50 per cent of our ventures. It is time we entered the air as men, as warriors, as a fighting Nation, and did something else besides kiteflying and sacrificing our best men eavesdropping.

I believe, and am prepared to make good that belief, that 20 of my battle planes, 40 of my fighting planes, and 20 of the smaller, swift, scouting machines could be built and delivered to the Government within six months. Such a fleet could deliver 100,000 pounds of high explosives on either Zeebrugge or Heligoland or Kiel Canal nightly for a week without especial danger to itself.

I will go further. I will, if the Government will order such a fleet, agree to deliver such a fleet a thousand miles by continuous flight from the base of manufacture ready for duty and provide bonds for the faithful performance of all agreements.

Sincerely, yours,

GUTZON BORGLUM.

I am writing to the President to-day. I inclose a copy of this letter.

STAMFORD, CONN., September 16, 1917.

To His Excellency WOODROW WILSON,
President of the United States.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am sending to you herewith a copy of a letter just sent to Brig. Gen. Squier, not to secure your urge upon this good officer, who is greatly interested in my labors and in sympathy with any sound development, but to inform you and also to arrest your attention at this time, when the clumsy, unmanageable triplane is being vigorously exploited, and state we have designed many models, the basic principles they proclaim proven and developed, ready for building.

We can build cars safe, stable in storm, incapable by their own caprice of plunging to earth, capable of carrying tons, serving each other in flight, giving rest and comfort to aviators in flight, remaining in the air 24 hours, which gives them the radius of Europe, Zeebrugge, the Kiel, and the Krupps. The navies have not accomplished the destruction of a single base, nor have three years of French, British, and German aeronautic activities, with billions behind them and the bravest souls on earth to go where ordered, accomplished potentially more than sniping and eavesdropping upon each other.

Mr. President, the plane in its present form is a glider; it is no more. With all it has done, it is incapable as at present constructed of being more than a kite run wild. It is like a playing card spun from the hand into space; it is no more; any multiple of it has proven no more. A hundred million packs spun in the same way will be at the same mercy of the elements as one, and, strangely, any additional blade to the plane adds to its certain destruction if it slips.

Our scouting radius should cover the shores of Europe. America's aircraft should push the boundaries of France and England and Petrograd and the Black Sea, including the Mediterranean. That is an American-sized job, and I believe one easily accomplishable. I would put a fleet of scouts in Europe with bases in south France, south Russia, north France, east England, and Scotland that would literally remap Europe.

STAMFORD, CONN., September 16, 1917.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am inclosing a copy of a letter just sent to Gen. Squier, not to seek your aid in developing my plans proposed, but, as I have suggested to the President, to whom I have also sent a copy, to urge a better plan and do what I can at this time to stop the United States from buying or ordering the lumbering, uncontrollable triplanes of the Italians.

We can do better, infants though we are. Asleep as we have been since Wright gave us the glider, we have slept at the wheel and rather retrogressed than otherwise. I mean the perfection of turnbuckles, additions of wind-pressure gauges, petty tricks related to petty parts have nothing to do with the success of aerodynamics.

I want to protest against any great outlay of money for the Italian planes, if we can create a better, more efficient, safer instrument to do the same thing they propose.

Sincerely, yours, (Signed) GUTZON BORGLUM.

STAMFORD, CONN., August 30, 1917.

MY DEAR PROF. DURAND: I received last week a letter from Prof. Alexander Klernin, of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, regarding the tests of my models. He, however, suggested a model smaller and weighing less than the one you had advised my making. Consequently, I made a couple of smaller models, and am now awaiting an opportunity to go to Boston and test them out.

You will be interested to know that I have made several unofficial tests here, all of which have been most gratifying and exceeding my anticipations. I shall report to you immediately when I have been to Boston.

Faithfully, yours, GUTZON BORGLUM.

Prof W. F. DURAND,
Chairman National Aeronautic Committee,
Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.

NEW YORK, November 4, 1917.

MY DEAR PROF. DURAND: There has been some delay caused in making the tests that you requested me to have made at the Massachusetts Tech on account of the fragility of my models. They were made of fiber, bamboo, and such materials, and were not believed to be strong enough to hold their position with sufficient accuracy to make a fair test. I am consequently meeting their wishes, having made two aluminum models. I am exceedingly sorry about this delay, because I wanted to meet your wishes in the matter, although the principles I hold are rather in opposition to the virtues of the present aeroplane. I mean that I am making use of a definite grip upon the air, and, while I may require an increase of power, I get stability in such degree that I believe I can afford to pay that small price for that great gain. When I am ready and have made the tests, you will learn the results.

Meantime, I have a definite request to make of you. I have perfected a brake or retarder which is applicable to any aeroplane. It is very easily operated. It will prevent side slipping, plunging, tail diving, and will act as a right and left control, in no way interfering with the natural function of the gliding plane, nor arrest violently or dangerously its speed. But it will bring any car down to its rising speed and hold it in space without throttling down the engine or in any way meddling with the power. I have been seeking a high-power and first-class plane for the purpose of applying this brake. I want the plane to be put at my disposal for about a month and then returned to the Government and thoroughly tested out. I have been unsuccessful in my application to private factories. Their planes are either too slow, worthless, or they are in hopes of getting rid of them at some fabulous price, or were held by the Government. I will come to Washington at your telegraphic call or meet your wishes in any way that you may require if I can make this demonstration. Of course, what I claim here will not only make any car hover while circling at 30 or 40 miles but will hold the machine over a 30-acre lot, and my retarder will make danger in landing almost nil.

The other request is, will you kindly send to me the regulations or specifications that the Government requires or has adopted as its best propeller? I am anxious to know the pitch, if uniform or variable—if variable, the stem pitch at, say, four radii—width of blade at four radii section; or if there are general specifications, they may cover my requirements.

I am under the impression that I can add a valuable percentage of efficiency to the best propeller that has been made. The tests I have made show this, but I am anxious to compare with official tests.

Will you also tell me if the Government is prepared to test propellers?

Sincerely, yours,

GUTZON BORGLUM.

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS,
Washington, D. C., November 17, 1917.

Mr. GUTZON BORGLUM,
166 East Thirty-eighth Street, New York, N. Y.

MY DEAR MR. BORGLUM: Replying to your letter under date of November 4, and telegram of November 9, I would say that earlier attention has been delayed by reason of my absence from the city on a visit of inspection among various plants manufacturing aircraft and aircraft materials.

Regarding your request in relation to propellers, I would say that there are no specifications regarding a so-called "best" or standard propeller. Present practice, however, circles closely about the following proportions:

(1) Ratio of pitch to diameter of .7 to .9, according to circumstances of speed.

(2) Average width of blade as a fraction of the radius .15 to .20.

(3) Form of blade oval, somewhat tapering toward the tips in the form which is doubtless familiar to you.

(4) Distribution of pitch either uniform or increasing from a minimum value at about .25 radius to a maximum at the tip, the amount of variation being 10 to 15 per cent of the tip value.

(5) Such propeller under best conditions of slip—that is, relation between speed of plane and revolutions—may be expected to give about 80 per cent efficiency.

I have just completed the report on an extensive series of investigations on model propellers, 48 in number, carried on at Stanford University, the result of which shows very plainly that the maximum efficiency does not vary widely for any propeller of the above general form and characteristics. We are just now planning to carry out in the same way a series of tests on models representing recent specific designs for the War Department, which will furnish a good comparison with the standard forms represented by our models.

Regarding your request for the use of a high-powered first-class plane for the purpose of applying your brake, I would say that there is very little hope of obtaining any such plane from the Government at the present time. If you knew of the number of inventors who are making similar requests to your own, you would appreciate the difficulty of meeting all of the requests of this nature. Furthermore, as a matter of fact, the Government has no such planes at its disposal at the present time. The planes which we are now actually making in quantity are of the training type and they are demanded more rapidly than they can be turned out, but a plane of this character would hardly meet your requirements. The factories are now only just beginning to get started on a program of fast high-powered machines, one or two samples having been turned out. It is, of course, quite impossible that you could expect to be loaned a sample of this type for the purposes indicated. The only way in which your brake device could be tried out in the immediate future would be by attachment to one of the planes at the temporary experimental field at Dayton, Ohio, where, in the very near future, they will have a number of such types of machine for purposes of experiment and development.

If you will come to Washington and give us an opportunity here of examining your device, with a view to its adaptation to such planes as are now contemplated of the fast, high-powered type, I shall be glad to assist you in every way toward placing your device before the authorities of the Signal Corps, with a view to making possible an investigation of its operation at Dayton. No other course seems practicable at the present time.

Sincerely, yours, (Signed) W. F. DURAND,
Chairman.

Borglum model was too large for this tunnel and was never tested. Borglum proposed to make smaller one but never did so.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE CONFIDENTIAL INFORMATION OF MILITARY INTELLIGENCE SECTION, UNITED STATES ARMY.

1. That in all of the relations concerning the matter of promotion of stock company for the manufacture of airplanes, during which I was present at several conferences with the projectors of this enterprise as a consulting engineer, I desire to state that there was never any other understanding of this project but that Mr. Borglum was to be represented in the corporation by Mr. Harris, and that his sole asset in the transaction was to be, first, his personal friendship and association with President Wilson, whom he stated he could do anything he wanted with.

2. As a further asset in this commercial venture, Mr. Borglum stated, and gave everyone concerned in this matter to understand, that his position with the Aircraft Production Board and the Aerial Section of the Signal Corps, United States Army, was such that he could obtain for their use plans and technical details which this company could use and thus save considerably both in time and money in beginning operations.

3. That one of the partners of this concern was to have been Mr. Hugo C. Gibson, who is connected with the British Ministry of War in the United States, offices at 120 Broadway, New York City, who proposed that certain patents which he controlled would be used by this company, and who also stated that he would be able to influence orders for airplanes in such a way that this company might receive the benefit therefrom.

4. That I was given to understand by Mr. Borglum that the present personnel of the Aircraft Board was highly distasteful to him, and he was constantly criticizing their work. That he definitely proposed to change this personnel by virtue of his friendship with President Wilson, and that he asked me to suggest members for the new board which would be more friendly to him in his projects. That I avoided giving him any definite answers along this line. That in the event of a newly constituted Aircraft Board being formed, there would then be no difficulty in securing advantage to the proposed organization.

JANUARY 30, 1918.

MISHAWAKA, IND., May 10, 1918.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Referring to your remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 7 regarding charges of Mr. Gutzon Borglum, in which the Dodge Manufacturing Co. is somewhat interested, I have the honor to transmit herewith correspondence and report of my son, Kenyon W. Mix, and statement of H. H. Suplee, our consulting engineer, regarding certain transactions which our company was having with Mr. Borglum and his associates, which may throw some material light on the conduct of Mr. Borglum, and which resulted in our company promptly terminating such negotiations when we discovered Mr. Borglum's duplicity.

Very respectfully,

DODGE MANUFACTURING COMPANY,
M. W. MIX, President.

JANUARY 17, 1918.

On December 8, 1917, I left Dayton en route for Washington. In the Pullman smoking compartment I noticed two gentlemen talking aviation who had apparently been to the Wright-Dayton field and who were discussing the inability of the Dayton-Wright Aircraft Co. to raise the new De Havilland No. 4 machine from the ground with the present propellers in hand.

These two men continued their discussion covering aircraft practice in general, and I decided to know them. Later on, entering into a conversation with them, I brought the discussion around to the subject of laminated-wood bodies, wing ribs, and wings for aeroplanes, and stated to them that, inasmuch as there seemed to be some hesitancy on the part of the American aircraft builders to construct single or double seated high-speed scouts, we, the Dodge Manufacturing Co., being in possession of the latest Albatross designs, intended to build one for trial, providing we could get some one to furnish us with the power plant.

The train being 18 hours late, I had considerable conversation with the two men, who turned out to be Mr. Gutzon Borglum, whose address is No. 166 East Thirty-eighth Street, New York City, and Mr. H. C. Gibson, an engineer in the employ of the British Ministry of Munitions, whose address is that office on the sixteenth floor of No. 120 Broadway.

These two men intimated to me that they could produce designs for a plane which would be faster and steadier in the air than the Albatross and which would weigh less.

Having at that time the interest of the Dodge Manufacturing Co. in mind, and being particularly anxious to become a part of any organization which would go into the manufacture of aeroplanes having monocoque fuselages, I led these gentleman to believe that we would welcome any suggestions from outsiders which would furnish the design and power plant for high-speed scouts.

Mr. Borglum and Mr. Gibson were very insistent that I call upon them in New York on my way up from Washington, which I did on December 18, 1917. I did not see Mr. Borglum, but talked to him over the long-distance telephone at Stamford. He insisted that I see Mr. Gibson at once. I did so, and learned from Mr. Gibson that Mr. Borglum had certain confidential connections with the Government which would be to our advantage as well as to his own.

I approached Mr. Gibson on the subject of building aeroplanes, and he suggested that I prepare in detail a report of the Dodge Manufacturing Co. and its subsidiary organizations for their consideration. Returning to Mishawaka, I did so, and wrote Mr. Gibson a letter, with the intention of drawing him further into a commitment. In this letter I stated that it had been intimated to us that high-speed scouts would be looked upon with favor by governmental authorities and again brought up the fact that design and power plant were the factors which the Dodge Co. lacked to begin immediate manufacture.

On December 31, 1917, a telegram (marked "Exhibit A") was received by me from Mr. Borglum. Mr. Gibson had apparently shown Mr. Borglum my letter, as I had asked him to do, and as is evident from Mr. Borglum's telegraphic response, which follows. I was led to believe that between them Messrs. Borglum and Gibson could provide a staff of experts with the best foreign experience on plane design.

"STAMFORD, CONN., December 31, 1917.

"Like your suggestion to Gibson. Write me fully part you and your company can play. I have a staff of experts with the best foreign experience who can come close to delivery 100 per cent article. Necessary, can arrange finances also with the best New York banks. Washington is watchful but waiting overtime. Your idea and mine should be rushed to the limit. We should guarantee the boys in France 500 of swiftest machines in the world by May 1, but not a minute can be lost, not a minute, during the next 90 days. A happy New Year to you.

"(Signed) BORGLUM."

Their confidence of being able to build speed scouts that would be acceptable to the Government was such as led me to believe that here was an opportunity to hook up with certain people who had the points of airplane building that we lacked and to their ability add our manufacturing facilities, with a view of producing high-speed scout planes which would be beyond the experimental stage and which could be submitted in the concrete to the Signal Corps rather than as designs on paper, which would be subject to criticism and change before the practical test could be made.

On January 2, 1918, I received a letter from H. C. Gibson, a copy of which (marked "Exhibit B") it attached hereto, which further led me to believe that our combined efforts could be used to produce aircraft, first in the experimental stage, and then, if approved by the American Government, in great quantities with the smallest possible delay of time.

I replied to Mr. Borglum's telegram on January 4, 1918, a copy of which letter (marked "Exhibit C") is attached hereto. I did not send this letter, but it explained fully our part in the manufacture of airplanes, either with our present facilities and under the name of the Dodge Manufacturing Co. or under a new company to be formed, which would consist of those manufacturers of the component parts of an airplane who might bring to the new organization a certain experience in the building of the units which they already understood and thus form a combination of experience and interest which would allow the new organization to pass quickly over the primary stages of experiment.

In suggesting the formation of a new company at that time it was my thought that the Dodge people would not care to share their ownership in the patents and processes surrounding the veneer industry any more than would Mr. Borglum and Mr. Gibson and their interests care to share permanently such interests as they might have in the design and power plant of such a machine with the Dodge organization, because of necessity they would become small factors in an organization the size of Dodge, which is composed of many branches foreign to aircraft production, and in which they could have no possible interest.

On January 4, 1918, and before mailing this letter, I received a telegram from Mr. Borglum, as follows (marked "Exhibit D"):

"Did you get my wire? Have you replied? When are you in New York or Washington? Reply Stamford, Conn."

I then decided not to send the letter but wired him instead, as follows:

"Your wire and letter from Mr. Gibson received on my return from Dayton. Your second wire received last night. Was preparing a letter to you fully covering situation. Have just bought plant of Gillette Motors Co., which adjoins property of veneer plant and which presents additional opportunity in way of machine tools and assembling space. Believe we have now provided for all body and wing construction, landing, and assembly; also metal fittings and accessories. If you can supply design, as mentioned in your wire, and propeller, there seems to be no reason why immediate operations could not be started. I can leave here Tuesday night, if you think it advisable.

"(Signed) KENYON W. MIX."

On January 6, 1918, I received the following telegram from Mr. Borglum (marked "Exhibit E"):

"I leave for Washington on serious business. Can you see me there at earliest possible date? Address me Metropolitan Club."

To which I replied, stating that I intended to come to Washington by way of New York, and asked him if that would be satisfactory.

On January 7, 1918, I received the following telegram from Mr. Borglum (marked "Exhibit F"):

"Am here indefinitely. Bring drawing, photos, or other portable data of swift foreign planes. See Gibson in New York"— and left for New York the night of January 8, 1918.

On January 9, 1918, I called Mr. Gibson at the British ministry by telephone, and was instructed to meet him in the afternoon at the office of Mr. Compton, an engineer, on the eighteenth floor of the Hudson Terminal Building. Mr. H. H. Suplee accompanied me on this visit. Arriving at that office, we were introduced to Mr. Compton, a designer of aircraft propeller and parts, who we understood was in the employ of Mr. Borglum and Mr. Gibson, and was engaged in the work of preparing drawings for experimental propeller business. We also met Lieut. Roberts, of the British Army, who stated that he had been invalided out of service and was available to private enterprises.

Mr. Suplee and Mr. Roberts then discussed the comparative values of American and foreign planes. Mr. Gibson and myself retired to Mr. Compton's private office and discussed the matter of the new company.

Mr. Gibson stated to me in this conference that Mr. Borglum's connection was with the highest authorities in the American Government, and showed me a telegram from a man by the name of Nichols stating that Mr. Borglum could put through anything that had merit. Mr. Gibson also stated that Mr. Borglum could not in any way be identified with the new company openly, and that his interest would be represented by a Mr. Harris, who he wished me to meet on the following day. He told me that Mr. Borglum was doing big things in Washington, but that it was up to Mr. Borglum to explain for himself what they were, after which he left the conference, leaving Lieut. Roberts, Mr. Suplee, Mr. Compton, and myself together. We discussed the relative value of various planes for an hour or two and adjourned to meet on Saturday.

On Saturday morning, January 12, 1918, I called at Mr. Gibson's office in the British Ministry, having instructed Mr. Suplee to meet me at half-past 2 in Mr. Compton's office.

Mr. Gibson introduced me to Lieut. Sykes, of the British Navy, with whom I had about a half hour's conversation on the subject of furnishing laminated-wood veneer for the British Government.

Mr. Gibson endeavored to get Mr. Borglum on the telephone, but was unable to do so. About noon Mr. Benjamin Harris, president of the Standard Smelting & Refining Co., in company with Mr. Grant, an attorney, called at Mr. Gibson's office and the four of us went to lunch together.

Immediately following lunch we proceeded to Mr. Compton's office, and although Lieut. Roberts was missing, he being compelled to go to Chicago on urgent business, we proceeded to discuss either the use of the present Dodge equipment for the building of speed scouts, or the formation of a new company to do this work, along the lines indicated in the letter written to Mr. Borglum and which was not sent (known as Exhibit C herein).

Present at this meeting were Mr. Benjamin Harris, representing Mr. Borglum, Mr. H. C. Gibson, Mr. Compton, Mr. Grant, above referred to, Mr. H. H. Suplee (present as consulting engineer of the Dodge Manufacturing Co.), and myself.

After giving an entire outline of the Dodge Manufacturing Co. and displaying blue prints of the ground plans, locations, photographs of plants, processes, machines, etc., I thoroughly explained the reasons why laminated wood made on the Indestructo process (similar to the German veneer process) was particularly adaptable to the building of monocoque fuselages and wings, such as were now being used in the best German practice. It was then suggested that a new company be discussed and the plan suggested above was gone over thoroughly, Mr. Gibson and Mr. Compton making a diagram as we went along, which is herewith submitted as Exhibit G.

The relative proportion of stock in the company was not discussed, it being the opinion of Mr. Gibson and Mr. Harris that Mr. Borglum should be consulted before this apportionment was made.

It was suggested that contracts should be entered into with the Dodge interests for the furnishing of such parts of the aircraft as they were able to manufacture, which contracts, along with those made with the propeller and motor interests, should constitute a portion of the assets of the construction company. An amount was decided upon necessary to start the company under way.

At this time I did not as yet know Mr. Borglum's connections in Washington, nor what his ability to furnish designs would be, and consequently I hesitated at making a final commitment of our position beyond saying that should such a company be created the Dodge Manufacturing Co. stood ready to furnish to the construction company all experimental work on the first plane and all laminated-wood materials, in addition to a plant necessary for the assembling of the plane.

This meeting adjourned pending my visit to Washington to see Mr. Borglum.

On Monday, January 14, 1918, an additional meeting with Mr. Harris developed the fact that as Mr. Borglum's agent he was not sure of the part Mr. Gibson or Mr. Compton was to play in the organization, although he seemed reasonably certain of the ability of the Dodge Manufacturing Co. to deliver as represented.

I arrived in Washington January 15, 1918, and called upon Mr. Borglum in his rooms at the Albany apartment house, second floor, in the afternoon.

Mr. Borglum's first question to me was, "Mr. Mix, do you know what I am doing in Washington?" My reply was, "Not exactly; but I have a good idea." Whereupon Mr. Borglum produced a letter, addressed to him and signed by Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States, which extended to Mr. Borglum official permission and authority to proceed upon some investigations which had been mentioned in Mr. Borglum's letter to the President and which was dated December 2, 1917, which letter was only mentioned in the President's communication, shown to me.

The letter to Mr. Borglum, and signed by the President, went on to state that he, Mr. Borglum, would have the cooperation of the Secretary of War and that Mr Stanley King, one of Mr. Baker's assistants, would be assigned to his use until investigation was completed and the facts ready for presentation to the White House.

Mr. Borglum then went on to state that he had been given room No. 225 of the War Department and corps of assistants, among whom were Mr. Nichols, whose identity I have not yet discovered other than that he was formerly connected with the Aeromarine Plane & Motor Co., of New York, and a second lieutenant of the United States Army, acting as stenographer.

Mr. Borglum then informed me that they had uncovered enough rottenness in the Signal Corps and in the Aircraft Production Board to make impossible the success of the American air program under the present régime. He informed me that he had but to requisition correspondence, orders, foundation plans, etc., from any department of the Signal Corps and they would be forthwith placed in his hands. He stated, however, that he was having considerable difficulty in getting this material, owing to the reluctance of Army officers to let him see it. He seemed to particularly condemn Col. E. A. Deeds, making various extreme charges against him, and also Col. Montgomery.

He referred to conference had with Maj. Gen. Squier, and went on to say, further, in connection with this gentleman that he had found nothing against him in his investigation.

Mr. Borglum stated that the Navy Department was the only department of the Aviation Section in which he had found efficiency, and spoke in very high terms of Rear Admiral Taylor. He stated that he had enough information on Col. Montgomery's activities to have him displaced on the Aircraft Board.

On the evening of Tuesday, January 14, 1918, Mr. Borglum, Mr. Nichols, Mr. Suplee and myself dined at the Metropolitan Club and afterwards remained in the library of the club for conference. I asked Mr. Borglum just what was to be gained by an exposition of these men and just wherein he thought he might serve the country by tearing down that for which he had no substitute to offer. Mr. Borglum protested he did not want to tear down the present organization of the Aircraft Board, but that he would build up a structure around it composed of men of unquestionable business methods and who would rush American air program to a rapid completion.

Mr. Borglum stated that he did not know at that time how to build scout planes or any other aircraft which could be depended upon to surpass those now being constructed, but that through his friendship with the White House and acquaintance with Mr. Gibson, the engineer in the employ of the British ministry of munitions, he would have access to the best foreign and American designs and practices. He then asked me to make suggestions as to a new personnel for the Aircraft Board and to suggest such men as I thought would be able to carry through the program rapidly and efficiently.

At this point I became suspicious, not of Mr. Borglum's methods but of his ability to aid the country by working along the lines he had suggested during the afternoon and evening conferences.

It is a mystery to me why a man vested with this high authority should make a confidant of me in matters of such extreme importance and secrecy, and why he should desire my opinion, which must of necessity be a very weak one, upon the personnel of a new Aircraft Board.

I decided something was radically wrong. The thought occurred to me that possibly this man, through his friendship with the President, had obtained authority which makes him decidedly dangerous to the interests of the country, in that he might remove from activity those people now responsible for the industrial development of aircraft without a hope of substituting in their stead a new working force.

It occurred to me that much valuable time might be lost; it further struck me that if he would take me into his confidence in this matter, he might take others less cautious of their country's interests and he might give wide publicity to the matters discussed with me and that he might show to others his credential from the President as evidence of his authority.

Such a method, to my mind, would be fatal, particularly if it became public property, and through the medium of gossip our aircraft program become known to the enemy.

I discussed this matter with Mr. Suplee, and stated to him on the conclusion of that meeting that, so far as the new company was concerned, I thought it best to drop all discussion of it, inasmuch as Mr. Borglum did not have the designs to submit for construction but was probably relying upon his official powers to requisition and get certain information from the Government which could be turned over to the new company for construction.

Upon leaving Mr. Borglum, and while escorting Mr. Suplee home, I stated that I was going to take the position of being very anxious to start the company, was going to call for designs, and was going to suggest to Mr. Borglum that it might be entirely possible for him to get these designs along the lines indicated, with the purpose in mind of seeing whether or not Mr. Borglum was willing to use his official authority as a means to further a privte interest.

After leaving Mr. Suplee I went back to Mr. Borglum's room and discussed the new company with him further, hinting at the matters above referred to, and upon being questioned by Mr. Nichols as to just what I meant, Mr. Borglum spoke up, stating to Mr. Nichols, "Don't you see what he is suggesting? He means can not we get the designs from which planes might be constructed at once." He assured me this might be entirely possible and again impressed upon my mind that he, of course, could not be identified with the new organization; that Mr. Harris, of New York, would have to represent him in all negotiations.

The following day, Wednesday, January 16, 1918, I decided that here was a matter which should be looked into at once and went to Mr. F. S. Hardesty, who is my father's confidant and a friend of Mr. Coffin, and put the case squarely before him, asking him what I should do. Mr. Hardesty hesitated for some time because he did not, I believe, appreciate the seriousness of the situation should Mr. Borglum misuse his authority. Mr. Hardesty finally consented to place a portion of the facts before Mr. Coffin without disclosing his source of information, and did so in the afternoon. Mr. Hardesty then reported to me that Mr. Coffin seemed interested, and after consulting Mr. C. A. Kenyon, an attorney and my uncle, and as a result of further consultation with Mr. Hardesty it was decided that it were best to lay the facts before Mr. Coffin without reserve. Consequently, I went to Mr. Coffin's office with Mr. Hardesty on the morning of January 17, 1918, where I met Col. Deeds, Gen. Squier, Col. Montgomery, and other members of the Aircraft Board. I did not, however, talk to any one other than Mr. Coffin and Gen. Squier, and then only in the briefest possible manner acquainted them with the situation as I have written it herein, stating also to Gen. Squier that on the night of January 15, 1918, at 6 o'clock, I had been in Mr. Borglum's rooms at the New Albany and had seen a United States Army officer, with the grade of second lieutenant, taking dictation from Mr. Nichols on the typewriter.

While writing this a letter arrives from Mr. H. C. Gibson, on the stationery of the British minister of munitions, and marked Exhibit "H," which speaks for itself.

Written in Mr. Hardesty's office at his suggestion.

UNITED STATES POST OFFICE.

DEAR MR. HARDESTY: The postmaster here thinks that this letter will get through to you by Thursday morning in good shape, and as I feel it necessary to see my father before I return to Washington I think it will go on to Mishawaka to-night. I can return at any time you think it wise for me to be there, either on the Borglum matter or on the other things which we have under consideration just now.

In regard to the Borglum matter and the papers inclosed. I think it would be all right to show these to whomever you think should see them, but do not believe that they should go out of your hands, as they are all the evidence that I have that we were not a part of the intrigue, but rather an interested party only so long as we knew it to be open and aboveboard. We most naturally withdrew at the first suspicion of intrigue and furthermore lay the whole matter before the proper authorities so far as we were able. After your man has seen the originals and knows that they will be open to him at any time, he should be satisfied with copies, don't you think? Please write me at Mishawaka just the result of your conference with him and what you have learned about this officer. That may be the Lieut. Roberts referred to in the manuscript. His address, by the way, is 50 West Thirty-eighth Street, New York City. Kindest regards.

KENYON W. MIX.

Mr. MIX, Jr., Mishawaka, Ind.:

Like your suggestion to Gibson. Write me fully part you and your company can play. I have a staff of experts with the best foreign experience who can come close to delivery 100 per cent article. Necessary, can arrange finances also with the best New York banks. Washington is watchful but waiting overtime. Your idea and mine should be rushed to the limit. We should guarantee the boys in France 500 of swiftest machines in the world by May 1, but not a minute can be lost, not a minute, during the next 90 days. A happy New Year to you.

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y., December 31, 1917.

KENYON MIX, Esq.,
Mishawaka, Ind.

MY DEAR MR. MIX: Mr. Borglum, discussing your interesting letter of December 28 with me, is, I understand, to write you in the endeavor to have a conference in New York as soon as possible.

I am entirely at one with you in the general suggestion that you make and it would seem that with all the facilities available we could not fail to obtain a really satisfactory result, which will have a most important bearing on the future of this country.

Does paragraph 3 of your letter mean that the new organization would have to look elsewhere for space, tools, etc., or have you them available for the suggested organization?

Your suggestion that this should not be discussed except between Mr. Borglum and myself is appreciated.

I hope to see you very soon so as to have the matter disposed of in one way or another in the shortest possible time.

It is my belief that we three would have little difficulty in assembling the necessary ability for a large productive program.

Reciprocating your cordial good wishes for the future, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

HUGO C. GIBSON.

MISHAWAKA, IND., January 4, 1918.

Mr. GUTZON BORGLUM.
166 East Thirty-eighth Street, New York City.

DEAR MR. BORGLUM: Returning from Dayton, I find your wire and a letter from Mr. Gibson. Thank you very much for your New Year's greetings; they are certainly appreciated, and my best wish for you in 1918 is that your best wish comes true.

I am glad to know that you are interested in the plane project suggested to Mr. Gibson. I have given the matter considerable study for some months, but not until we acquired the plant of the Gillette Co., which we did last week, did it seem entirely feasible. Even now there are some elements of the manufacture missing, unless between us we can arrange for their inclusion.

We own and operate four plants, whose facilities are available for this type of work. It is not my idea, however, that the assembly of the finished plane should be done in any one of these, but rather in a separate building and by a separate organization yet to be formed, and of which I will speak further.

Our four plants consist of:

Dodge Manufacturing Co., a plant of considerable size, employing more than 2,000 men, whose industry is practically unlimited along lines of iron and steel. We have complete wood and metal pattern room, extensive iron foundry, sheet-steel work plant, and a complete wood shop, with considerable dry-kiln capacity. In peace times our output comprises everything for the mechanical transmission of power. At present we are pretty well loaded with Government business, comprising shot trucks, rammers, ordnance equipment, and marine engines for the Emergency Fleet Corporation, in addition to extensive orders for the regular orders from arsenals, new Government shops, and independent concerns who are thus forced to increase their products.

There is the National Veneer Products Co. division of the Dodge Manufacturing Co., a complete pressing and woodworking establishment of considerable size. We have practically every type of hydraulic press known for the formation of laminated-wood shapes and, in addition, are just installing the largest veneer press ever built in this country for flat sheets. While in the past our industry in this plant has comprised that of trunks, barrels, hampers, boxes, casks, grain elevator legs, boots, heads, flour bins, seats of all kinds, etc., our facilities are now practically limited to the production of aeroplane parts, such as box beams, compression ribs, interribs, struts, spars, cowlings, fuselage coverings, and afterdeck coverings, wing coverings, engine bearers, skids, landing-gear parts, transverse girders for dirigibles, etc. This is all in addition to the production of flat glued-up panels for the Philadelphia naval aircraft factory, the United States Government experimental station at McCook Field, and others, whose uses prevent the forming of parts away from the place of assembly. In connection with the veneer plant we operate a complete die-press room, which in the past was used for the manufacture of metal hoops and box and trunk hardware, etc.

The Dodge Steel Pulley Corporation is a separate plant of considerable size, which operates exclusively in pressed-steel pulleys, hanger frames, etc. We are practically unlimited as to the size of pressing in this plant, and I believe that it is one wherein aeroplane hardware could be successfully manufactured.

We have just purchased the Gillette Motor Co., formerly the Amplex Motor Car Co. This plant is equipped for complete motor-car building, including that of motors, although we had no intention at the time of purchase of going into the motor industry; it was bought because of its unusually complete tool equipment and the facilities it presented for assembling the shot-truck order recently gotten.

The Gillette plant and the veneer plant are about 1 mile apart. The majority of the intervening ground belongs to these plants. There is, however, a small establishment, known as the Premier Bed Co., located at one end and next to the veneer plant, which could undoubtedly be acquired quite within reason, and which might be used for a designing and experimental laboratory.

Let us now consider the building of scout planes from the following standpoints:

DESIGN AND EXPERIMENTAL WORK.

A corps of engineers and draftsmen could be immediately installed in the old drafting rooms of the Gillette plant. There is also a portion of the same plant which could be set aside as an experimental laboratory.

GLUED-UP VENEER STOCK.

To be manufactured in the veneer plant.

FABRICATION OF WOOD PARTS.

For the present these parts could be manufactured in the veneer plant itself along with the present orders from Dayton-Wright, the Navy aircraft factory, and others. Later, however, it would probably be advisable to do this fabrication in the new plant.

LINEN COVERING.

The work on wings and fuselage if wrapped in linen would undoubtedly have to be done in the new establishment, except on the first few planes, when the old assembly rooms of the Gillette plant could be used.

METAL FITTINGS AND STAMPINGS.

Such as is possible for us to manufacture could be turned out in the die rooms of the veneer plant or steel pulley shop.

BODY ASSEMBLY.

This work would undoubtedly need to be done in the new shop because of the extreme space required.

MOTORS.

Here is one of the unsolved links of the whole problem, and the question naturally arises, Are we to make this plane according to Government design or according to a design which we know will do the business and then sell it to the Government in its finished state? If the former case is decided upon, we would undoubtedly be asked to use the Liberty motor. In case of the latter, it would seem to me that the ideal condition would be to make arrangements whereby some representative motor manufacturer should become a stockholder in the new company and his motor plant enter into a contract to produce certain types of motors for their needs. I have in mind one particular motor, but I would be interested in hearing your experience as to what you believe would be the ideal motor for such a plane.

PROPELLER MANUFACTURE.

This is another unsolved point so far as we are concerned, but one which, I understand, you have the solution to.

FINAL ASSEMBLY.

The assembly, instruments, tanks, controls, guns, mountings, bomb carriers, etc., should undoubtedly be done in the new plant; testing will be covered later.

My first idea in this matter which I would offer is that of a new company organized to manufacture completed planes of certain types. It would be composed of certain individuals from our plants, certain individuals representing other branches of the art in which they have specialized, and regarding which they will bring to the final organization an experience which will enable the company to pass the stage of the usual primer experiments.

Midway between the Gillette plant and the veneer plant a new building could be erected of the Austin standard type, covering approximately 120,000 to 200,000 square feet of space, which, we understand, can be completed within 45 days from the date of order, and which is the establishment referred to above as the "new plant."

This company would be organized for the purpose of operating under the patent rights already developed in wood veneer as applied to aviation processes, together with other inventions and patents covering other details of the work, which may be brought to the new organization by other members of the company. Under the original patents and processes covering our end of the business, together with such later developments already under consideration, the immediate control of this department of industry would be assured, just the same as I presume would apply in your case or in the case of others whose patent rights were necessary in the assembly of the final plane. Whether or not it would be advisable to go into this phase of the question, I am not sure. I would rather have your opinion on the subject.

The whole proposition looks to me as though we have at present ample space and tools to start manufacture. We can have within 60 days an assembly plant equal to the task of producing 500 planes by the 1st of June. By virtue of our combined processes, inventions, and patent rights we have passed largely over the stage of experimental delays, and would be ready from the formation of the company to tackle the actual task of producing.

To our minds, the designing and aeronautical engineering ability is lacking. Your telegram states that you can supply this. Mr. Gibson and yourself, from what I gather, are also in a position to solve the propeller question. Why not, then, put our ideas together and see if some common basis can not be found upon which we may pool our assets, our ideas, and aspirations in the new company to the end that the aircraft shortage may be relieved, at least so far as one type of plane is concerned, and incidentally that we may each profit from our mutual associations.

I have had a complete set of drawings, blue prints, list of tools and machines, available properties, floor space, heating establishments, and other facilities, with an additional itemization of the combined possibilities of our end of the negotiations, which I am intending to bring on to New York whenever you are ready to undertake their consideration. In other words, we will be ready in the course of a few days to lay our cards on the table face up before some one who can consider the proposition from the standpoint mentioned herein, who are willing to go the route with us, just as we are willing to do the same with them.

I have sent Mr. Gibson a copy of this letter that he may be in full touch with the situation. I await with interest your reply either by letter or wire.

Very sincerely, yours, DODGE MANUFACTURING CO.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 10, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, our Heavenly Father, without whom nothing is strong, nothing holy, we thank Thee for the spirit which brings us to Thee in prayer, since it stirs the soul, quickens the conscience, purifies the heart, and clears the mind for action; that Thou being our Ruler and Guide, we may take up the work Thou hast given us to do and consecrate ourselves to its prosecution, with the same determination which characterizes our soldiers and sailors, the conquer-or-die, survive-or-perish spirit, leaving the results to the overruling of Thy wisdom, power, and goodness; for Thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. KITCHIN, as Speaker pro tempore to-morrow, Saturday, May 11, 1918.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 10264) to prevent in time of war departure from or entry into the United States contrary to the public safety, had asked a conference with the House of Representatives on said bill and amendments thereto, and had appointed Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. KING, and Mr. NELSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following House concurrent resolution:

House concurrent resolution 40.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That with the approach of Mothers' Day the attention of the Nation be directed to the patriotic sacrific made by the mothers of our land in freely offering their sons to bear arms, and, if need be, die in the defense of liberty and justice. That, in appreciation of this great sacrifice, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to recommend in the observance of Sunday, May 12, 1918, as Mothers' Day, that the people of the United States offer fervent prayers to Almighty God for His divine blessing on the mothers of our country, especially those having sons serving under our flag throughout the world.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

The Committee on Enrolled Bills reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 8753. An act to amend section 3, title 1, of the act entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes," approved June 15, 1917, and for other purposes.

"FOR GOD'S SAKE, HURRY UP!"

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for eight minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the other day I undertook to answer the intimation that had been spread broadcast throughout the country that the House was deserving of censure because it had wasted time in disposing of the great measures necessary for the prosecution of this war. In those remarks I challenged any man to mention one single measure which had the backing of the American people which had been unnecessarily delayed by this House. It remained for one newspaper, and just one, so far as I have been able to ascertain, throughout the Nation to take up that challenge. That paper is the Raleigh (N. C.) Evening Times, I may say a very well-edited, very useful, progressive, and patriotic afternoon paper. The Times says in its editorial columns of the issue of May 6 the following:

GLAD TO OBLIGE; HERE ARE TWO THINGS DELAYED.

Congressman EDWARD W. POU, galled by the "For God's sake, hurry up!" cards addressed to the Members of Congress by the people back home, demands to be informed of any one thing which the people were solidly behind delayed by Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I did not say delayed by Congress; I said delayed by this House of Representatives. The editorial then continues:

The Overman bill, to empower the President to coordinate war agencies, is one of these "any one things." The espionage bill is another.

[Laughter.]

Back of the first measure we believe there are a hundred million people, for the Nation perceives that the Commander in Chief is the logical man to boss the war job. Who has heard an objection raised to the Overman bill, save by sore-headed Members of Congress? All are not agreed on the exact phrasing of the espionage bill, but all want a bill with teeth in it, and want it now. If Congress had devoted more time aiming the measure at pro-Germans rather than in an attempt to keep some disgruntled politician from bawling out a more successful politician, the espionage bill, too, would have had the undivided support of the American people. Have these measures been delayed? The best friends of Congress can not say that they have not. Anything of this kind that we can do for you, Mr. POU, will always be done gladly.

Surely the editorial writer on this paper does not keep up with the current events of the day. Surely he does not read the proceedings of Congress or even the digest of the proceedings published every day in many newspapers of the country. Why, Mr. Speaker, the Overman bill did not get here until last week. Everyone, except the gentleman who wrote the editorial I have read, knows that the Overman bill has been held up in another body for three or four weeks. The measure has not even been before the House of Representatives. As I have said, it was only sent to this House last week, and I am told that on the very day following its reception by the House it was taken up by the Committee on the Judiciary and put on the calendar with a favorable report on the 9th of May, and on yesterday my colleague, the leader of the majority, Mr. KITCHIN, of North Carolina, obtained unanimous consent for the consideration of this measure in the near future.

Mr. GARNER. On Monday of next week.

Mr. POU. Yes; on Monday next.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr POU. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Is it not a fact that this bill was considered and reported favorably by the Committee on the Judiciary in an hour and twenty minutes?

Mr. POU. Yes; I was coming to that. I am glad the gentlemen mentioned it. After consideration of 1 hour and 20 minutes by the Judiciary Committee the bill was reported favorably.

Mr. LAZARO. By a vote of 15 to 1.

Mr. POU. By a vote of 15 to 1, as the gentleman says.

Immediately the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], with his usual promptness, upheld, as he always is, by every patriotic man in this Chamber—Democrat as well as Republican—because we are all cooperating in doing what we can to put through without delay all of these great war measures, asked and obtained unanimous consent for the consideration of this measure, and it will be considered on Monday of next week. There will be no delay; certainly there will be no unnecessary delay. That is my answer with respect to our action on the Overman bill, to which the editor of the Raleigh Times points me with an assurance and confidence born of ignorance.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman think these cards that are coming to us should be addressed rather to some branches of the executive department asking them to hurry up with aircraft production, ship construction, and the manufacture of heavy artillery? [Applause.]

Mr. POU. I will say to my good friend from Indiana that I can not go into a discussion of those matters here and now. I will say, however, that I believe somebody has committed a crime against the American people in the manufacture of aircraft, but the House of Representatives can in no wise be held responsible. We were asked to appropriate $640,000,000 about a year ago, and a bill making the appropriation asked for was promptly passed. What I undertook to prove, and what I believe I have proven, was that this House is not responsible for any delay in passing any one of these great measures necessary to carry on the war and demanded by the American people. Where men have done everything humanly possible to put through these measures it is nothing short of insult to put in motion a post-card chain addressed to those men telling them "For God's sake, hurry up!"

Now, how about the espionage bill pointed out by the editor of the Times? Why, it was put on the calendar of the House on April 17. We all know it has been in conference for some days. The article I have read appeared on May 6, and on the very day after the article appeared the conference report on the espionage act was agreed to in this House by a vote of 292 to 1. [Applause.] No man can charge there was any unnecessary delay. The conferees agreed as promptly as any reasonable man could expect on a bill of such importance.

Mr. MADDEN. I suppose the editor will think he did that.

Mr. POU. Perhaps so. In any event, we acted on the very next day after the article appeared, but I imagine no one here at that time had read the editorial.

Mr. Speaker, I am not going to charge the writer of the article with intentional unfairness, but he never even alluded to some statistics from the Committee on Rules which I quoted showing that the Committee on Rules had authorized during this Congress 26 favorable reports, and that the discussion on all the reports presented to the House did not consume one legislative day. In fairness, the writer might have said something of those statistics, for I believe I am safe in saying no former House has acted with greater promptness or with so little debate upon an equal number of special rules.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. In substance, the whole offense of the gentleman the editor referred to is that he is wanting in knowledge.

Mr. POU. In language sometimes employed by the courts, I will say it would seem so. In the article I have read the writer says Congressman EDWARD W. POU is "galled," and so forth. Why, Mr. Speaker, there is no reason on earth for me to feel galled about anything. I have no grievance. Personally, I care nothing about the post-card offensive. They do not concern me personally and they do not reflect in any way on the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman. Now, it is seldom in good taste to inject one's personality into a discussion here, but inasmuch as I am charged with being galled into replying to this post-card offensive, I think I may be excused for asking the Clerk to read a letter I received a few days ago from the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the President of the United States, to show what he thinks of my course as a Member of this House in helping as best I can to put through promptly measures deemed necessary for the prosecution of the war.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, May 3, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. POU: You are always generous and helpful and I thank you warmly for your letter of yesterday. Undoubtedly you know the best way to handle H. R. 10264, the passport bill, and I am more than willing to trust entirely to your judgment.

Thanking you again for your very great generosity in cooperating,
Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

Hon. EDWARD W. POU,
House of Representatives.

[Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, no man has any right to intimate that I am galled about anything. Indeed, such intimation is entirely gratuitous. In conclusion, let me say this: There is a cheap and common practice among certain gentlemen of the press—few in number, I am glad to say—to reflect upon Congress upon any slight pretext, no matter what we do or how hard we strive to do our full duty. It is thought by some to be popular to take a fling at Congress any old time. Something goes wrong, Congress is to blame. As a private citizen you may have the confidence of all your people, but as soon as you get to be a Congressman you are ready to put in pawn your immortal soul to stay here. I am not saying this as applying to the editor of the Raleigh Times. I know the proprietor of the paper personally, and take pleasure in saying he is not a man who would do intentional injustice to anyone. But we all know there is a sentiment that it is reasonably safe to knock your Congressman. There are people, and they are not a few in number, who affect to believe that as soon as a man becomes a Congressman he keeps his ear to the ground eager to catch any change in popular sentiment, ever ready to change his course to square with any shift in the wind. If we do not defend ourselves when we know unjust charges are printed, who is there to see that we get a square deal? The point I am making is that the membership of this body have every reason, every incentive, every possible stimulus to speed up all measures necessary to win this war. There is no reason why we should be legislative slackers, and I say we are not. I see men on all sides who have boys on the firing line. The membership of this body are represented in France just as other American fathers are represented there. And I say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that the membership of this body loyally upholds the hands of the constituted authorities to see that the war is conducted vigorously. This House, without regard to party, standing together almost as one man, more than 400 strong, willing to risk all, willing to do all, willing to stay in session night and day indefinitely, if necessary, will in the future, as in the past, uphold the hands of the Commander in Chief and all other constituted authorities in bringing this war to a speedy and victorious end. [Applause.]

CONFERENCE REPORT ON HOUSING BILL.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 10265) providing housing facilities for war needs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not do it without unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take it up.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report on the housing bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask what has become of the penitentiary measure reported under a special rule? Apparently that very important war measure is to be further delayed. I do not think it ought to be delayed under these circumstances by conference reports or appropriation bills, particularly in view of the fact that it was urged as a war measure and was made immediately in order after the adoption of a special rule. Along that line, I would like to ask the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds about how long he thinks action on the conference report will take, if it is taken up.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. It ought not to take 10 minutes.

Mr. WALSH. What is it?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The housing bill.

Mr. WALSH. The $60,000,000 housing bill?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Is there a full agreement between the House and the Senate?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; an absolute agreement.

Mr. CANNON. When was the report made?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. On May 7, I think. It has been printed, and the statement has been printed.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; but there is so much doing that we have to get reports on the fly unless we can multiply ourselves by 2 and 3.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. If consent is given, I will ask to have the statement read.

Mr. GARNER. There was no real difference between the House and the Senate?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; they have come to an absolute agreement.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does a conference report take precedence over a special rule?

The SPEAKER. No; it does not, and the Chair required the gentleman from Florida to ask unanimous consent, and that is what he is doing now.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand, the main difference between the House and the Senate was that the House placed the power and complete authority with the Secretary of Labor to use this building fund. The Senate changed it by putting the power and authority in the hands of the President. That was the main difference.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. There were two or three things, but the main difference was as the gentleman from North Carolina has stated. There was another difference—the Senate struck out the power to take over electric railway transportation and other facilities, and after the House had agreed to the substitution of the President the Senate had no objection to putting that back.

Mr. KITCHIN. The House gets what it passed, except the transfer of the power to use the money from the Secretary of Labor to the President.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That was the main difference.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether I am right as to that amendment which was strenuously pressed by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that so far as the $10,000,000 appropriation for the housing in the District of Columbia is concerned that the House conferees receded from its position and agreed to strike that out.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The House did.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee whether that action has the approval of the gentleman who sponsored it, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not know.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I can not allow this to come up by unanimous consent until the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] comes in.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. I object.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union on the pension appropriation bill. I understand that that has been agreed to by the gentleman in charge of the penitentiary bill.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman in charge of the penitentiary bill can not control it. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] asks unanimous consent to take up the general pension bill, the special rule to the contrary notwithstanding. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this, of course, is the annual measure that is passed each year, and certainly there is no urgency about that and no particular reason why it should be given preference over this great emergency war measure, for which we adopted a special rule the other day, and I will object.

MANUFACTURE OF SUPPLIES FOR GOVERNMENT AT ATLANTA PENITENTIARY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects. The House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8938.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8938) to equip the United States Penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., for the manufacture of supplies for the use of the Government, for the compensation of prisoners for their labor, and for other purposes, with Mr. RUBEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 8938, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8938) to equip the United States Penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., for the manufacture of supplies for the use of the Government, for the compensation of prisoners for their labor, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Attorney General of the United States is authorized and directed to establish, equip, maintain, and operate at the United States Penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., a factory or factories for the manufacture of cotton fabrics to supply the requirements of the War and Navy Departments, the Shipping Corporation, cotton duck suitable for tents and other army purposes, and canvas for mail sacks, and for the manufacture of mail sacks and other similar mail-carrying equipment for the use of the United States Government. The factory or factories shall not be so operated as to abolish any existing Government workshop or curtail the production within its present limits of any such Government workshop.

SEC. 2. That from and after July 1, 1918, articles so manufactured shall not be purchased from any source other than governmental for the United States Government, or any department, bureau, or other agency thereof, unless the Attorney General or his authorized agent shall certify that the same can not be furnished by such prison factory or factories, and no claim shall be audited or paid without such certificate.

SEC. 3. That articles so manufactured shall be sold at the current market prices as determined by the Attorney General or his authorized agent, and all moneys or reimbursements received from such sales shall be deposited to the credit of the working capital fund created by this act.

SEC. 4. That the Attorney General is hereby authorized and empowered to provide for the payment to the inmates or dependents upon inmates of said penitentiary such pecuniary earnings as he may deem proper, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe. Such earnings shall be paid out of the working capital fund.

SEC. 5. That there is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $650,000 for the purchase of machinery and other equipment to carry out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 6. That there is created a fund, to be known as the working capital, which shall be available for the carrying on the industrial enterprise authorized herein or which may be authorized hereafter by law to be carried on in said penitentiary. The working capital shall consist of the sum of $350,000, which sum is authorized to be appropriated. The receipts from the sale of the products or by-products of the said industries and the sale of condemned machinery or equipment shall be credited to the working capital fund and be available for appropriation by Congress, annually, for the purposes set forth in this act.

SEC. 7. That said working capital shall be disbursed under the direction of the Attorney General and shall be available for the purchase, repair, or replacement of machinery or equipment, for the purchase of raw materials or parts, for the employment of necessary civilian officers and employees at the penitentiary and in Washington, for the repair and maintenance of buildings and equipment, and for all other necessary expenses in carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 8. That the products of said industries shall not be disposed of except as provided in this act.

SEC. 9. That all laws and parts of laws to the extent that they are in conflict with this act are repealed.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 2, after line 7, at the end of paragraph, add a new paragraph to section 1, as follows:

"The Attorney General is hereby further authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase or condemnation proceedings, such tracts of land at such points as he may determine, which may be cleared, graded, and cultivated. And the Attorney General is authorized to employ the inmates of the institution herein mentioned under such regulations as he may prescribe in the work of clearing, grading, and cultivation of such acquired tracts of land. The products of any such agricultural development shall be utilized in supplying such correctional institutions as the Attorney General may designate, or in his discretion may be sold."

Page 2, lines 8 to 15, inclusive, strike out all of section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule adopted there will be one hour of general debate, one half to be controlled by those in favor of the bill and the other half by those opposed. The Chair supposes the gentleman from North Carolina would control half of the time, but would like to be informed who will control the other half.

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] is opposed to the bill, he would be entitled to control that side.

Mr. CANNON. If there is anybody opposed to it, they ought to have half of that time.

Mr. DYER. I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. GARNER. Who is going to control the opposition time?

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. GARNER. Will the Chair make inquiry to see whether there is anyone in the House opposed to the bill?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am opposed to the bill.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Missouri, a member of the committee, is opposed to the bill, and is the senior member of the committee——

Mr. WEBB. It is my understanding the gentleman from Missouri would control the time.

Mr. GARNER. I am trying to ascertain whether the gentleman from Missouri was opposed to the bill, and I have not heard him say so up to date.

Mr. DYER. I stated to the Chair; I have not stated it to the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. Did the Chair understand the gentleman from Missouri was opposed to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] was opposed to the bill, and, as he is a member of the committee, will control the time in opposition to the bill. With that understanding the Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina to control the other half of the time.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be notified when I have used 10 minutes. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, about three years ago the question of what should be done with the Federal prisoners in the Atlanta Penitentiary, where about 1,400 are now kept, and at the Leavenworth Penitentiary, where about 1,600 are kept, became a grave and acute question with the Government of the United States. Congress realized the gravity of the situation, because at that time the vast buildings which have been in course of construction at the Leavenworth and Atlanta Penitentiaries were nearing completion, and it was the desire of the Congress that some work should be given those prisoners, who had heretofore been employed in the construction of the penitentiary buildings, in the nature of a useful and a gainful occupation inside the walls or as near to the penitentiary as proper. Yielding to this feeling, Congress, in 1916—I think it was September 8—passed a law providing for a commission which was in substance as follows:

To be composed of the Chief of Ordnance of the United States Army, the Chief of Ordnance of the United States Navy, and the purchasing agent of the Post Office Department, and the superintendent of prisons of the Department of Justice, as a commission to investigate and report detailed estimates and plans for equipping the United States penitentiaries for the manufacture by prisoners of the various articles used by the Government. Such report shall indicate what articles it is thought desirable to be there manufactured, the cost of equipping existing buildings, and the construction and equipment of any other necessary buildings recommended.

Now, that commission immediately went to work—and I should say it was composed of Gen. Crozier, Gen. Strauss, Mr. Edgerton, purchasing agent of the Post Office Department, and Mr. Duehay, superintendent of prisons. These four commissioners investigated the conditions of McNeil Island Prison, where there are about 200 prisoners, Leavenworth, and Atlanta. They filed their report, dated December 2, 1916. I believe the law required them to report at the December session; and they recommended that in the Atlanta Penitentiary there should be constructed a plant for the manufacture of textile goods, largely, if I remember, for the purpose of making mail sacks for the United States Government. At the Leavenworth Penitentiary they recommended the erection of a furniture factory, to be used in the manufacture of furniture to be used exclusively by the Government. Now, in response to the recommendation, this Congress a year ago passed an act appropriating enough money to erect a building at Leavenworth and one at the Atlanta Penitentiary, the one at Leavenworth to be used for the manufacture of furniture and the one at Atlanta for the manufacture of textiles.

Mr. AUSTIN. What was the recommendation as to the prison on the Pacific coast?

Mr. WEBB. At McNeil Island? They made no recommendation as to that point. They first considered the question of the manufacture of munitions of war there, but they said it would not be a wise thing to allow prisoners to handle such dangerous and high explosives as munitions, and therefore they made no recommendation in view of the fact that the prison was a very small one, only having about 200 to 250 prisoners.

Mr. NOLAN. If the gentleman will permit, since that time recommendation has been made for the penitentiary at McNeil Island to be utilized for the manufacture of pulp and paper.

Mr. WEBB. I understand so, but I am speaking of the report upon which Congress acted. Now, last year this Congress appropriated $129,000 for these buildings as recommended. The authorities went to work immediately in Atlanta and Leavenworth and inside of 60 or 90 days the laborers and prisoners in the Atlanta Penitentiary, together with such outside help as was necessary to be employed to build this structure, erected a concrete building 210 feet wide by 465 feet long, with a sawtooth roof and a concrete floor, and in all respects a modern, up-to-date building suitable for the manufacture of cotton textiles. The building stands there idle now. There are 1,400 prisoners in that penitentiary now idle. These prisoners have been for the last 15 or 20 years erecting buildings in the Atlanta Penitentiary which are now worth from three and a half to four million dollars, but that work is done and those prisoners now have nothing else to do.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. HICKS. Under what authority were these buildings erected of which the gentleman speaks?

Mr. WEBB. The Atlanta Penitentiary buildings?

Mr. HICKS. The new ones to be used as a workshop.

Mr. WEBB. The authority of Congress a year ago.

Mr. HICKS. Did we pass it?

Mr. WEBB. This Congress passed it a year ago.

Mr. CANNON. From what appropriation and at what cost?

Mr. WEBB. One hundred and twenty-nine thousand dollars.

Mr. CANNON. And prison labor utilized in the construction so far as it could be?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON. How much is the additional cost now? Is this just the mere building?

Mr. WEBB. I am coming to that, and I will tell the gentleman. What I wanted to impress on the committee is this: That acting upon the mandate of Congress the authorities have already erected a magnificent building of concrete, 465 feet long and 210 feet wide, for the purpose of accommodating machinery to manufacture cotton duck for the use of the United States Government.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am a little concerned about these matters, because I do not like to see the Government going into competition with citizens in any lines of business where it is unavoidable. Are the products of this plant to be used exclusively for the Government?

Mr. WEBB. Absolutely. The bill confines them absolutely to Government uses—the Army, Navy, Shipping Board, and for mail bags.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Suppose we supply all the Government needs in six months?

Mr. WEBB. Then, under this bill, they will have to shut down.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am glad of it.

Mr. WEBB. I want to say to the gentleman——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did the gentleman read section 2 of the bill, which fixes the sales at the current market prices?

Mr. WEBB. Absolutely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That does not mean outside?

Mr. WEBB. Not at all. That was carefully considered and gone over. I will say to the gentlemen of the committee that since war was declared there has occurred in the United States a most acute and grave shortage of cotton duck, of heavy cotton goods which they call ducking. I have a letter here from the War Industries Board of the Council of National Defense which I will not take the time to read, because it is in the hearings, and I put it in the RECORD day before yesterday, in which this board, through Mr. Scott, says there will be for 1918 a shortage of 5,000,000 to 6,000,000 yards of this ducking; that it can not be furnished by any private enterprises in the United States to the Army for its tents, the Navy for its sails, or to the Shipping Board, or for mail sacks for the Post Office Department, which can not possibly be supplied through commercial production of duck in the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. For a question.

Mr. MADDEN. What about the truth of the statement that was made on the floor to the effect that private manufacturers of duck, capable of supplying 5,000 yards of ducking a week to the Government of the United States, have been endeavoring for more than two or three months to get a reply to their suggestion that they could do that from the Government authorities, and have not been able to get it?

Mr. WEBB. I saw that statement in the RECORD by Mr. Snell. I do not know anything about it. I called up the textile board, and they said that the shortage now is as acute as it ever was. I know this, that they are needing it, and that machinery for manufacture of carpet is endeavored to be used for manufacture of duck which is for the use of the United States—for the Army and Navy and the Shipping Board.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. HUSTED. What is the estimate of time for equipping this building with machinery and actually getting it in such shape that a quantity of production of duck could be had from it?

Mr. WEBB. Six months. The tentative contracts have already been made, and we are told by gentlemen who ought to know that within 1 year or 18 months, with the price that duck is now bringing, the institution will pay for itself. That is the financial side of it. It ought to be put in, because there is an acute Government shortage in this particular kind of goods greatly needed for the Army and Navy. The proposition is to put 500 looms in this building and 78 twisters.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has consumed 10 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. I will use five more. They do not propose to spin any cotton, but they propose to buy it already spun and twist it with these twisters and weave it into duck with the 500 looms. We are sure it can be done, and the mill will be runnnig within six months.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption for information?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I will yield for a question.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire whether the amounts as carried in the bill are for the equipment to the maximum capacity or whether the committee followed the recommendations of the commission that it should be merely an experiment? I notice that in the report, in the amount of the appropriations recommended by the commission, they are nearly one-half of those carried in the bill. Is it the purpose of the bill under consideration to establish this on a permanent, full-equipped basis or merely as an experiment as recommended by the commission that investigated this subject?

Mr. WEBB. I think the commission recommended $625,000. It is an experiment, because these 500 looms can be operated by 250 men; but it is proposed that 400 out of the 1,400 prisoners be used in running these looms, because they do not propose to work the prisoners the same length of time as they would outside men.

Mr. SHERLEY. In order that the gentleman may get the information, I wish to state that the original plan contemplated 359 looms. That was the number in the former estimate. The present one, as has been stated by the gentleman, contemplates 500 looms. To that extent it is an enlargement of the original plan.

Mr. WEBB. In view of the great war emergency.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill as recommended by the commission and printed in the report carried amounts much less than are recommended in the bill under consideration.

Mr. SHERLEY. The original plan contemplated 359 looms. The present appropriation carried in the bill is for 500 looms and 78 twisters. That will be found in the hearings.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire whether this number of looms will equip the plant so as to utilize the labor of all of the confined prisoners?

Mr. WEBB. No. Only 400 prisoners will be used for that work. If you should use them all it would probably take 1,000 looms. But it is thought best that a part of them, 250 prisoners, should work out on the farm and 250 in the yard and 450 on this duck manufacture, and about 25 per cent would be unfit for any kind of work.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. DOMINICK. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not in the hearings it was developed that any investigation was made by the health authorities or by anyone familiar with health conditions in the prisons as to the effect upon the health of inmates of textile manufactures within prison walls?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir; and I unhesitatingly say that within this great concrete building, with perfect sanitation and perfect ventilation throughout, with its humidifiers and every up-to-date improvement, the prisoners will be maintained under just as about as healthy a condition as we have in the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. What is the estimated capacity of the looms?

Mr. WEBB. From five to six million yards yearly.

Mr. AUSTIN. It is not proposed to work the convicts on four looms apiece?

Mr. WEBB. No. It is proposed to let a prisoner operate two looms instead of four.

Besides that, labor has indorsed this movement, and all advanced prison reformers have indorsed it. It is also a step forward in modern humanitarianism that we propose, so that when they get out of prison they will have something to give to their wives and children and at the same time will have learned a profession. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. FESS. There has been some objection to this on the ground that we could not get the machinery in time to use it?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. I have a statement from this commission and from Mr. Duehay, the superintendent of prisons, saying that the machinery manufacturers in Massachusetts have promised to deliver the machinery in six months after the contract has been let.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the average number of prisoners in that institution?

Mr. WEBB. It has grown from a thousand about four years ago to 1,400 at present at Atlanta, and it is 1,600 at Leavenworth.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What is the number of men proposed to be employed on the machines?

Mr. WEBB. Four hundred to do the work in this textile plant.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. "Cotton fabrics" covers a great many materials, as carpets and sheetings, and so forth. Is it the object of the Government eventually to manufacture all cotton materials?

Mr. WEBB. No. This bill confines it to cotton duck and material suitable for tents and mail sacks, and so forth.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. It says "cotton fabrics."

Mr. WEBB. Cotton duck suitable for tents. The language of the bill, if you will look at the bottom of the first page, is "cotton duck suitable for tents and other Army purposes and canvas for mail sacks."

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. It says "cotton fabrics." Now, cotton fabrics include carpets and all kinds of material for sheeting.

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman will look at the bill, on line 8, of the first page, he will see the language there is "cotton duck suitable for tents and other Army purposes and canvas for mail sacks and for the manufacture of mail sacks and other similar mail-carrying equipment."

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. What does it mean—"a factory or factories for the manufacture of cotton fabrics"? That is very plain.

Mr. WEBB. It is confined to cotton duck for those purposes. Now, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, a bill similar to this was offered to this House in normal times prior to the war, so that this is simply a continuation or renewal of a proposition to bring convict labor into competition with free or paid labor. The laboring people of this country, organized and unorganized, have been appealing to Congress for 10 years to pass a bill to prohibit the transportation of convict-made goods in interstate commerce. This House has passed such a measure once or twice, but it has never succeeded in getting through the Senate, so that instead of going forward with the legislation seeking to put an end to the competition of convict labor with free labor, this House is now urged to inaugurate a precedent, establish a precedent, for this great Government to do what this House in a previous Congress decided should not be done by the States, namely, to bring their convicts in competition with honest free labor.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. Not in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Now, this bill is not necessary to supply the Army's or Navy's equipment, for it only means one plant employing 420 people.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AUSTIN. No. I have not time. In five minutes I can not do it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I represent a textile district, and I will guarantee to furnish the Government of the United States with the amount of ducking from a private plant in my town—Knoxville, Tenn.—equal to the output of the proposed penitentiary mill. There are thousands of textile mills in the United States, and I doubt not many in the district represented by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], the chairman of this Committee on the Judiciary, having this bill in charge.

Mr. WEBB. There are 220 in my district.

Mr. AUSTIN. If the Government needs these supplies, mill owners can afford to lay aside some of their outside business and come to the aid of the Government. Why not use the convicts, if their services are needed, in the construction of military roads in this country? They are absolutely essential, and we have already appropriated money which is now being expended in the construction of roads down in the neighborhood of Norfolk and Newport News. We can find a place and necessity for the work of convicts in the open air, where their labor will not come in competition with that of the skilled mechanics in the industrial plants of the South and other sections of the United States.

This great Government owes a duty to the men who have gone forward in investing their money in creating an industrial system in the United States which has given employment at good wages to a great industrial army, and Congress has enacted laws here which are requiring these men to pay income and excess-profits taxes, and thus aid in financing this war. We ought to protect their investment and the honest, deserving people who work for them. We ought not at this time or at any time—for there is no real necessity for it—inaugurate a vicious system which commits the American Congress to the encouragement of competition between convict labor and honest free labor.

This House has been practically unanimous on all war legislation; but I draw the line against this unpatriotic legislation, for it is not war legislation. It is proposed legislation which was attempted here in times of peace. It is not necessary, and while there has been a united Congress in favor of war legislation, I believe there ought to be united action against committing our Government to this vicious system of bringing convict labor in competition with the labor of our own constituents, and I hope the Republican and Democratic Members will do what they have done in the past when similar legislation was brought forward, and will defeat it for the honor of the American Congress, defeat it for the welfare of organized and unorganized labor, defeat it in the interest of invested capital and in behalf of loyal and patriotic employees who are doing their full share in the vigorous and successful prosecution of this war. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I hope in this brief time to remove several misconceptions touching both the origin and purpose of this bill.

More than 10 years ago in this House I called attention to the fact that the Congress of the United States could not justify its then and its present system of treatment of convicts. I believe that the Government of the United States owes something more to a convict than to turn him out at the expiration of his service with a new suit of clothes and the brand of a felon upon his back. [Applause.] I believe that a humane Government owes to him a chance in life, and I have always believed that there was nothing so destructive of the character of a man as having him perform useless labor. Convicts in the penitentiaries of the United States have been required to pick up building stone and carry it from one side of a yard to another and then carry it from that side back to the side from which they took it in order that they might not be absolutely idle.

Mr. ANTHONY. Will the gentleman state where that happened?

Mr. SHERLEY. It happened in a United States penitentiary at times when the work was not sufficient to keep all the men employed.

Mr. ANTHONY. My understanding has been that there was work in constructing these penitentiaries.

Mr. SHERLEY. There was, but there was not always enough to keep all the men employed. Therefore, irrespective of any war emergency, and long before the war was thought of, I introduced a provision, which was carried in an appropriation bill, for the appointment of a commission to report on how to use the labor in the Government penitentiaries, knowing that with the completion of the work of construction of prison buildings hundreds of the prisoners would be kept in idleness. That commission was composed of men who were chosen presumably because of their knowledge of the matter that they were to deal with. It was composed of the ordnance officer of the Navy, the ordnance officer of the Army, the superintendent of prisons, and the purchaser of supplies in the Post Office Department.

If you will consider that personnel you will see that it carried an officer from the Army and an officer from the Navy who were manufacturers, who had been engaged for the Government in manufacturing work. It carried a representative from the Post Office Department, because at that time it was believed that that department would have most need for supplies which could be manufactured in this way, and it carried properly the man who had charge of the penitentiaries. They were not required to report in favor of or touching any particular industry, but they were called upon as follows. This is the language:

There is created a commission, to be composed of the Chief of Ordnance of the United States Army, the Chief of Ordnance of the United States Navy, the superintendent of prisons of the Department of Justice, and the purchasing agent of the Post Office Department, who shall serve without additional compensation and who shall report to Congress not later than the first Monday in December, 1916, detailed estimates and plans for equipping the United States penitentiaries for the manufacture by the prisoners of various articles used by the Government. Such report shall indicate what articles it is thought desirable to be so manufactured, the cost of equipping existing buildings and the erection and equipping of any other necessary buildings, the probable cost of manufacture of such articles and the price now paid under contract, and such other data as may be pertinent to the general inquiry. For expenses of the commission, to be paid on vouchers to be approved by the chairman, who shall be selected by the members thereof, $5,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. Briefly.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the report show the cost of manufacturing the commodities they recommend?

Mr. SHERLEY. There is a very full report, which is found in Document No. 1762, Sixty-fourth Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the report compare the cost of manufacturing in prison with the cost of similar articles purchased outside?

Mr. SHERLEY. It undertakes somewhat in detail to state something of the cost. That commission reported in favor of a cotton factory at Atlanta. They reported in favor of a furniture factory at Leavenworth, and they reported the details of the buildings and the cost of equipment and the amount of money that was necessary as a working capital. I then carried in the sundry civil bill a provision for both the buildings and the factories.

The proposition came onto this floor. A point of order was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER], who stated that he did not believe it was fair to put the Government, as he thought, in competition with furniture manufacturers, some of whom were his constituents, and, naturally, he felt that he must make the point of order. He did make it, whereupon this House adopted a rule making these provisions in order on the sundry civil bill, and the House, practically without dissent, passed an appropriation in the sundry civil bill carrying the money for both the building of the factories and the equipment of them. The bill went to the Senate. There was considerable opposition to it by certain Senators from the South, who were opposed to having a cotton factory which they thought would be in competition with some factories that would furnish the Government with this material. They struck the matter out. It came into conference. As one of the conferees on the part of the House I made the best fight I could in conference for the provision that the House had put in, and succeeded in retaining that part of it which related to the construction of the buildings, but that part for the purchase of the machinery went out. These buildings have been constructed. I then introduced a bill for equipping the factories and subsequently the present bill. Meanwhile the war broke, and there came a situation where the Government was scouring the country for the purpose of getting cotton duck. I do not know the facts of my own personal knowledge, but I do know of the representations that have been repeatedly made to me, and some of which are of record, by gentlemen of the Council of National Defense dealing with cotton fabrics, and by other officials of the Government, stating that they were unable to obtain in America the output that they need for governmental purposes at this time.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will yield to the gentleman briefly.

Mr. MADDEN. The statement has been made on the floor to the effect that there are cotton-duck factories enough now.

Mr. SHERLEY. I know; I have heard that statement. All I can say is that I do not know of such factories. I am satisfied, however, that the statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee, if accurate, will not be accurate long, because I know that the Government is anxious to get an additional output of cotton fabrics, and they would not have gone to the extent of inducing and putting pressure on the manufacturers of carpets to convert their looms from carpet making into cotton-duck making if there had not been a tremendous demand over and beyond existing capacity.

Now, I must hurry along, for I want to say a few words about competition. This bill is so drawn as to prevent competition in the sense that the laboring men have objected to in the past and do at present. I sympathize thoroughly with their opposition to being put in active competition, affecting prices, with prison-made articles. That proposition is not involved in this proposal, and no man who wants to be fair to the House can claim that it is. What is involved in it is this, that the goods shall be made exclusively for the Government. It does mean, of course, that to the extent they are made for the Government by convict labor they would not be bought from private manufacturers. But it does not mean that the goods are to go on the market to be competitive against free-labor goods, and that is a distinction that is fundamental.

There is another thing—I do not want this factory created for the sake of saving money. I want it created for the sake of saving lives. We want to help these poor unfortunates who are in the penitentiaries. Men talk about putting them on the roads. A certain number of men can be put into that service and employment, but all of them can not. A certain number of men can be worked on the farm, but all of them can not. A certain number can be worked in the factories, but all of them can not.

This bill stood the scrutiny of prison-reform men who have given their lives to the study. It stood the scrutiny of organized labor in this country. They are not on record as being against it, but just the contrary is true. The bill makes provision for payment to the prisoners employed, or to their dependents, of wages that represent the value of their work over and above their cost of maintenance. It offers an opportunity for real work of a real value under conditions that will be sanitary and not unhealthful. It does not represent the last word in prison reform, but it does represent a step forward. It is not a thing thought out suddenly. It is not a thing that is done haphazardly. It is a thing being done as the real judgment of men who have been engaged in manufacture and who know something of the case. And its need is further emphasized now by virtue of the Government's need. I urge it, not simply as a war measure, although it has the right to that title; I urge it as a humanitarian measure, as something better than the do-nothing policy that has characterized this Government for many years past touching prison labor. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I can not agree with my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] that this bill does not involve the principle of competition between prison and free labor. It does involve that question, and for that reason I can not give it my approval. For many years it has been a principle of organized labor that this very kind of competition should not be encouraged. Congress has recognized that fact, and if I am not very much mistaken the gentleman from Kentucky and many of his colleagues who now advocate this particular prison measure have stood here strongly advocating the passage of interstate-commerce laws preventing the passage from one State to another of convict-made goods.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. The difference between that proposition and this is simply that that bill was to throw convict-made goods into general competition in commerce.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has supported measures in this House to prevent the passing from one State to another of goods made by convict labor.

Mr. SHERLEY. Not to prevent the passage only, but to prevent competition in commerce.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know the gentleman's position, but he will not carry that point so far as one day following the termination of this war, for then free labor will be brought into competition with the prison labor of Georgia. This bill provides for permanent law. The prison labor in the Atlanta Penitentiary is to be used presumably for the purposes of the Government during the war, but when the war closes and free labor returns to the mills and asks for fair employment this competition will be evident.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, we do not propose that this shall be in competition; it is to supply the Government to the extent that it can.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Exactly; but the provision in the bill is for annual operation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course. What would the gentleman do with these convicts?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not the time to keep up this controversy, but the gentleman asks me what I would do with them?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] is a good one.

Mr. SHERLEY. How about competition there?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We could use them in open-air work on the roads.

Mr. SHERLEY. How about competition with the road makers?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is a different kind of labor. This involves the principle of taking convicts and training them to take the place of free labor. That is what this involves.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Is it not a fact that whatever you work them at you are bound to come in competition with somebody?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. You may somewhere; you probably will; but I would like the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO], as well as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], to help protect free labor. I would like them to produce some evidence of approval of this bill by free labor. You may have that voice stilled now during the progress of the war, but you do not bring the testimony that free labor is in favor of this measure or the principle that this bill involves. This bill means that you start prison-labor competition in the Atlanta Penitentiary, and there inaugurate it for all penitentiaries throughout the country.

Mr. LAZARO. Does the gentleman take into consideration those who are not organized?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am always considering men who are not organized and want one man to have an equal chance with another.

Mr. LAZARO. How can you work them at all without competition somewhere?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say to my friend from Louisiana and to my friend from Kentucky that I am so broad in my industrial beliefs that I would like to see, though I come from a manufacturing center in the North, an extension of those industries in the Southern States. I should like to see the cotton mills placed side by side with the field upon which the raw cotton is produced. I believe the future of the South depends upon the encouragement of industry in the South. The South has been enslaved to its raw production. It has limited its energy to the raising of cotton. The moment the South understands the manufacture of cotton and places the mill by the plantation then the South will understand what it will mean to put a factory in a penitentiary, where the convicts are made to compete with free labor. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY].

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, and gentlemen of the House. one of my principal reasons for opposing this measure at this time is that the people of the country are being taxed to the extreme limit for money to carry on this war, and now it is proposed to take $1,000,000 out of the Treasury, raised for the purpose of carrying on the war, and under such pretense, establish an industry in the South to come in competition with every cotton-mill spindle in the land. No man can justly say these goods will not compete with the products of cotton mills. This institution is to be permanent, and whether it is permanent or not, if it supplies the Government of the United States with cotton goods, it comes in competition with every industry in that line. What is the use of talking such nonsense as to say that it is not a competing industry? I have a telegram which I received here not five minutes ago, giving the names of the cotton mills of this country engaged in the manufacture of ducking, and they have not been requested by the Government to make a single yard of these goods because the Government needs them so badly. What is the use of this buncombe that this thing is being created because of the great need of Uncle Sam to carry on this war? I am getting tired of this nonsense of gentlemen coming in here and asking for measures to aid in carrying on the war when they are brought in for no other purpose than political reasons. You have captured the railroads by your theory that the Government needed the railroads in carrying on the war. Now comes the Secretary of the Treasury, in addressing an audience of railroad men down in Texas, he said—or at least is reported as saying, "You are my boys, and I am going to take care of you through thick and thin." That is all the Government took over the railroads for, in my judgment—to control the votes of 2,000,000 railroad employees in the next general election, and that is what you are trying to do here. Talk about what you want to do for these men in the prisons. I will tell you what to do for them. Teach them to keep away from anarchy, from I. W. W.-ism, from murder and burglary; teach them to be good citizens and to stay out of the prisons and you will need no employment for them there.

Mr. LAZARO. Would the gentleman work them at all?

Mr. FORDNEY. I know we need prisons in this country, and God knows there are a lot of fellows on the outside that in my opinion ought to be on the inside right now, but they are in the class that I just mentioned.

Mr. LAZARO. Would the gentleman work them at all?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but I do not believe in working the taxpayer whom you are calling upon for money to carry on the war, in order to in an underhanded way establish an industry in the South.

Mr. LAZARO rose.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I have only five minutes, and I can not yield any more. We have about 33,000,000 spindles in the cotton mills of this country, and no request from Uncle Sam to any of the entire number to make ducking, now claimed to be so necessary in carrying on the war to support our boys in the trenches over the sea. What tommy-rot! It is nothing short of that. Gentlemen talk here about giving the convicts outdoor exercise. Are you going to make a pleasure resort of Atlanta, Ga., for convicts?

There is nothing in that proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This million dollars which it is proposed to appropriate would buy a considerable amount of cotton duck, would it not?

Mr. FORDNEY. Oh, yes. This talk about the Government making anything as cheaply as the individual or a set of individuals can is only nonsense. If you establish this industry the Government will not show any overhead expense, just as the Brooklyn Navy Yard has shown in the construction of battleships. The cost of constructing battleships is somewhere from 20 to 30 per cent more than in private yards, and this does not give interest upon the capital invested, no overhead expenses, no charge for draftsmen, who are paid through the Navy or the Army, none of those expenses added to the cost, and yet the cost of construction under the Government control and the cost of operation is from 20 to 30 per cent greater than in the private yards of this country. I am opposed to it; I am unalterably opposed to it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman on that side desire to use some time?

Mr. WEBB. I would like the gentleman to use the remainder of his time; there will be only one speech on this side.

Mr. DYER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER].

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, this bill comes before the committee under false pretenses. It comes here as a war measure. My understanding is that long before the United States entered this world conflict this same proposition was being pressed upon the attention of the Committee on the Judiciary for consideration at its hands. Failing to get that consideration, as in a great many other cases and with a good many other propositions, the war has been made the excuse for bringing it before this House. I am absolutely opposed to the principle of it, and I am glad of an opportunity not only to vote against it, but to voice my opposition to it on the floor of this House. [Applause.] The South is to become the great manufacturing center of this country. She is entitled to become it, because the very logic of things brings the manufacturing end of it in contact with the raw material; but I am not willing to make the South, and I do not believe the people of the South themselves are willing to make it, the cotton-manufacturing center of the Nation by the employment of convict labor. [Applause.] I am opposed to this proposition because it is not limited to the war. Its provisions carry it beyond the period when peace has come. In that event you will force convict labor—convict-made goods—in competition with free labor. I am against that principle, and I have always been against it.

I am against it for a higher reason even than that. The experience in my own State, when at one time we worked convicts in a hosiery mill, was that it tends to promote tuberculosis and to increase it, and I believe that the State owes to its convicts that humanitarian treatment which our civilization should give to those whom the law of the land has found necessary to imprison for the protection of others. [Applause.] And I am not willing by my vote or by my voice to give the sanction of the Federal Government to the proposition of employing Federal convicts in cotton-mill work when experience conclusively has been—the experience of my own State has been—that it has tended to increase tuberculosis in those mills. You say, "What are we going to do with them?" My own proposition would be, and I think every progressive State in the Union has tended in that direction, to employ these convicts in such work as will give them the most air, sunshine, and outdoor exercise. The man who is to survive the rigors of life must have fresh air and sunshine. I would work these men on the public roads if that were necessary, and other lines of industry that they may go into without affecting their health; but, in any event, I would try to place them in such industries and in such work as will give them the most of free sunshine and free air. I shall vote against this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, did the gentleman yield back any time?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman had expired.

Mr. DYER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], a member of the committee.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill not because I am opposed to putting convicts to work but I do not think as a humanitarian measure in these modern days it is wise for the Government to embark upon a program of shutting convicts up in cotton factories in order to save their lives, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] intimated was one of the purposes of this measure. I advocated before the committee that we should provide that they might be given outdoor work, clearing land and engaging in agricultural pursuits, and the testimony that we had, and the admission of gentlemen who appeared in favor of this plan, was to the effect that that was the modern tendency in prison reform. Now, a great deal has been said about equipping these men for following these pursuits in after life. The textile industry of this country is one of the most closely organized of any of the industrial activities and, in my opinion, you need have no fear that these gentlemen who have spent a term within prison walls, working in textile pursuits, will be welcomed with open arms into the manufacturing establishments by their fellow workers after their term of service has expired. We all know how hard it is for those gentlemen to get into industrial activities thereafter. Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that if the Government is in need of this cotton duck, which need has been pressing, we are advised, for months, because we were so informed last December, that need is not so great when they are willing to wait six months—because that is the period that must elapse before they can install the equipment and have it running so as to manufacture a yard of cotton duck at Atlanta if this bill passes—it is not so great but that they can wait that time for it; and if it is so urgent why have not the authorities commandeered some of the cotton mills in the South or in the North and put them at work manufacturing cotton duck? Another thing. If this plant is established, and this war continues, it will result in taking the cotton which has been made into yarn by other mills for furnishing this penitentiary and which is needed for other classes of goods, because, mind you, they do not intend to spin yarn down at Atlanta but they intend to take the yarn that has been spun elsewhere and then convert it into a coarser yarn in order to make cotton duck, mostly sacking, and other character of material.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. COX. Is there anything that appeared before your committee which would show that this mill or plant could be equipped with cotton machinery within the amount appropriated here?

Mr. WALSH. No; at the time the hearings were held it was assumed that the sum of money that they now ask for would be sufficient to equip the building which was asked for at that time; but, of course, considerable time has elapsed since the hearings and since the estimates were made, and I believe it was admitted at the hearings that prices had advanced appreciably. And, of course, since the bill was reported——

Mr. COX. Has anyone appeared before your committee who knew what he was talking about on that line?

Mr. WALSH. There was a superintendent of prisons, who had a very carefully detailed estimate which he submitted, and that estimate was prepared by a firm of competent cotton mill engineers who knew how much machinery was required for a certain space and the kind and character of the different machines needed to make this particular class of goods.

Mr. COX. If this machinery is once installed, what will be the maximum output of the mill?

Mr. WALSH. They think that they can make 6,000,000 yards of cotton duck annually with the 500 or 450 looms that would be installed in this building. The modern tendency, Mr. Chairman, has been—and it has been followed, not only in my own State but in other States—to establish what we call in our State a State farm, and they have converted what has been heretofore a wilderness and barren land into most fertile agricultural farms, and they are cultivated and cared for by the convicts. Those convicts are kept out of doors, and even in the severe rigors of winter they find outdoor work for them.

Mr. SHERLEY. Was not the testimony before your committee that only a certain percentage of these men could be employed outside?

Mr. WALSH. I will admit that. The testimony was that only a certain percentage was suitable for agricultural work and only a certain percentage would be suitable for textile work, and that some men could not be put at any work. The vicious prisoners would have to be kept in close confinement.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I have two other gentlemen who want to speak upon this, and the debate heretofore has been entirely upon this bill, and it is new practically to most of the Members, and I would like to know if the gentleman from North Carolina would consent, which motion I make, that the time be extended 10 minutes on this side, and if anyone wants additional time over there that it be extended 10 minutes more.

Mr. NOLAN. I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. I have no objection to that, if it is agreeable to the committee.

Mr. COX. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the time be extended 20 minutes.

Mr. DYER. I hope, Mr. Chairman, there will be no objection, because everything that has been said upon this bill to-day has been entirely relative to it and its merits.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman propose to occupy the 20 minutes in a general debate on some other matter?

Mr. DYER. Not at all. I will yield to no one on this side unless he will discuss the bill itself.

Mr. COX. There is another measure here of great importance, and while I regret very much to do it I will surely be compelled to object.

Mr. WEBB. I propose to move that the committee rise as soon as this debate is exhausted and ask that the pension bill be taken up.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana object?

Mr. COX. Let me see if I understand the request of the gentleman from Missouri. It is to extend the time of debate 20 minutes, 10 minutes to be used on each side?

Mr. DYER. That is all.

Mr. COX. I think it is a useless consumption of time, but I will not object; but if any more requests for time come up I will do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DOMINICK].

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, my State is second only to Massachusetts in cotton manufacturing. The district which I have the honor to represent contains about one-fourth of all the textile manufacturing institutions in South Carolina. I am not basing my opposition to this bill solely on the ground of competition, but, as was suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], who has just preceded me, I am opposing it upon the higher ground—that is, the humanitarian ground—a ground upon which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] also said he was supporting the bill.

What are the humanitarian questions in this bill? The gentleman from Kentucky said that this bill is not the last word in prison reform. No, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen; it is not the last word. It is from way back yonder, almost, in the Dark Ages, and this plan that is now proposed for working prisoners in cotton manufacturing is out of date, and it is shown to be out of date by the advanced thought of to-day.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOMINICK. For just a brief one. I have only five minutes.

Mr. BLACK. Is not the difference here: That work in cotton mills by convicts would be more conducive to tuberculosis than anything else?

Mr. DOMINICK. I will get to that in a moment.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] refers to a commission that has examined into and made recommendations as to the employment of prison labor. He has read a list of those who composed that commission. There is not one single member of the health department of this Government on that commission, as I heard it read. Not a single member of the health department, so far as I know, testified as to health results on prisoners in the hearings on this bill before the committee.

What were the conditions in South Carolina? We had a hosiery mill there within the prison walls. It became notorious that tuberculosis was being hatched in that hosiery mill, and it became known in South Carolina as a tuberculosis incubator. Gov. Blease, who was then governor of South Carolina, made a determined fight for the abolition of that mill being then operated within the prison walls. He met stubborn opposition, but finally the House of Representatives of South Carolina, by unanimous vote as I now recollect it, voted to abolish it, and the senate concurred in that action with only one dissenting vote; and that mill has been abolished.

Now, my friend from Texas asked why the difference between working prisoners in these textile manufactories and in the ordinary cotton mills? It is this: This mill in South Carolina was abolished after thorough investigation and condemnation by the State board of health and other health authorities. The difference is this: When your prisoner within your prison walls is marched into that factory in the morning, he is kept there until luncheon, and he is crowded there within those walls, brought out in the afternoon, has a few minutes' recreation in the open prison yard, and then is marched to his prison cell for the night. For the cotton-mill operative and cotton-mill families, as we have them in the South to-day, they have good, comfortable homes, churches, schoolhouses, amusement halls, and magnificent recreation parks in all the communities. They have such hours that when they get off from their work they can enjoy recreation at these parks. They may work in their gardens, visit and mingle with their friends and neighbors, enjoy fresh, free, and health-giving air, and attend amusement places. They are free men. They have their half holidays on Saturday; they have all of Sunday to enjoy themselves and keep them in health, while the prisoners have not.

Now, I am not unduly concerned entirely from the humanitarian standpoint and the standpoint of justice to the prisoners, but you must remember one thing, that we are fighting and have been fighting the white plague, one of the most destructive pests that has ever ravaged this country, and when these prisoners contract tuberculosis in these indoor mills in the penitentiary they not only injure themselves, but when they are released from these prison walls they carry out the disease with them and spread it broadcast throughout the State and in the communities to which they go.

Now, my friends, that is my position in this matter. If you will notice the hearings, you will find that the committee did not have one single representative from the health department to tell them as to the bad effects of working prisoners in such factories. If they had, I am satisfied the committee would have been told that it is not the proper thing to do, and what is now proposed is a step backward and not forward in prison reform. The representatives from the department of prisons say that the increasing weight of opinion is that convicts should be worked in the open and in agricultural pursuits.

The present solution of the problem in South Carolina is to work all able-bodied prisoners on the public roads and the State farms. Those prisoners who are so dangerous that close confinement is necessary are worked within the penitentiary walls in sewing, repairing, gardening, and chair making. No one in South Carolina having in mind the conditions once prevailing in that penitentiary hosiery mill would for a moment seriously consider a return to that system.

I hope that the bill will be defeated, as it ought to be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, it is rather singular that gentlemen from South Carolina are so solicitous about the health and welfare of men in the penitentiaries who might be compelled to work in the cotton mills provided for in this bill, being afraid the confinement at this kind of employment might be productive of an epidemic of tuberculosis. If my recollection serves me aright, practically the entire South Carolina delegation in the Sixty-fourth Congress voted against the Keating child-labor bill. They did not seem to be so solicitous about the health and welfare of the children in the cotton mills in South Carolina, or as fearful of the little children in the cotton mills of that State contracting tuberculosis as they are about the health of the inmates of the penitentiary at Atlanta, Ga.

I am surprised to see that there is so much opposition to a measure of this kind. These gentlemen say it is not the last word in prison-labor reform. The best posted people in this country advocate this system as the ideal system for the employment of convicts. The principle involved here has the support of the National Prison Labor Committee. The bill itself has the support of the National Prison Labor Committee. It has the support of the American Federation of Labor. It has the support of every organization in this country that has given any serious thought to prison-labor reform. It has already been adopted by a number of States. Not one man interested in prison-labor reform, unless he was in some way or other connected with contract labor, appeared before the Committee on Labor when it had under discussion the Booher bill, which would have provided for the manufacture of mail sacks, cotton duck, and tenting at Atlanta, furniture at Leavenworth, and pulp and paper at McNeils Island.

When you talk about entering into competition with free labor—this system is noncompetitive and the least objectionable of all—let me call your attention to the fact that there are three systems connected with convict labor. First take the contract system. That is almost wholly abolished in this country, except in a few States. The product of the convicts enters actively into competition with the products of free labor, because the product is sold in the open market in competition with the product of free labor, and thereby determines the price of the class of goods on the market and is unfair competition.

There is another system adopted by a number of States, particularly in the Middle West, what is known as the State-account system, where the State penitentiaries manufacture, it may be, canned goods, it may be binding twine, or it may be farm implements. They manufacture these articles and sell them to the consumers and producers of the State. That is known as the State-account system, and it also goes into competition with free labor. You do not hear any complaint about that from the gentlemen who are opposing this bill. The principle involved in this bill is what is known as the State-use system. It was first adopted by the State of New York and it is in active operation there now. Everything that is made in the State penitentiaries of New York is made for the State itself or for one of its municipalities or political subdivisions. It can not go outside into the channels of trade in competition with free labor.

That is all there is in this bill. They intend to establish down at Atlanta a cotton mill with 500 spindles. They will operate two spindles with one convict. Two hundred and fifty convicts would be employed in one shift if they have two shifts. They will probably divide it up into shifts of five hours each. There are 1,600 convicts there now. Some useful employment should be found for the eleven or twelve hundred extra men outside of the cotton mill. In addition to that, you must expect to get back during this war from the front, both as Army and Navy prisoners, thousands of men who are court-martialed and convicted of infractions of military rules. Are you going to send these men into your Federal prisons and have them eat their heads off? This bill will initiate a system whereby they will be employed at useful work, and compensate them for it; our military prisoners can not be classed with convicts in the State prisons who are sent up for all sorts of crimes. Many of these men will get long sentences for offenses that in ordinary times would be overlooked, but in war times are considered seriously. They are entitled to better consideration than ordinary convicts.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] talked about teaching the men in the penitentiaries to keep away from the I. W. W. What are you going to do with the I. W. W.'s when you send them to the penitentiary? They have over 100 of them on trial in Chicago now. If they are convicted, they will have to be kept employed; and if you do not keep them steadily employed they will make I. W. W.'s of nearly everybody else in the penitentiaries to which they are sent. Idle and discontented men are virgin soil for I. W. W. propaganda, but fairly treated prisoners steadily employed in the prisons will pay no attention to the preachings of these industrial outlaws.

If you want to do the right thing, adopt this principle. It will employ only four or five hundred men, but it will be an experiment in Federal prisons with the labor of our Federal prisoners, and the same system must be extended to Leavenworth, and it must also be extended to McNeil Island.

I did not entirely agree with the employment found at Alcatraz Island in San Francisco Bay for the military prisoners out there. I agreed, however, that they should be employed at some useful occupation, at some work that they could be able to make a living at on the outside, and they can be employed in the textile mills after they have worked at this trade and have been released from prison.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. May I have one minute more?

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for one minute more.

Mr. NOLAN. Out in San Francisco Bay they are using the military prisoners as laundry workers. In the absence of machinery and some other form of employment that is the best thing they can do with them. But if they make textile workers of them, the gentlemen from Massachusetts need not be afraid that the textile factories of their districts will be brought into competition with the products of convict labor. No protest has been received here from any textile workers. The employment of 450 men on 500 spindles is not going to affect the textile industry one bit. You may have to extend and diversify the employment of convicts, but if you want to do the right thing do not look upon it as a war measure; look upon it as something for the good of the convict and something for the good of the State.

You are entitled to the labor of those convicts. They are entitled to be paid something for it. This bill provides for their compensation, either directly or to their dependents. But above all, you will give those men and women a chance when they enter into private life again to take up some sort of a useful vocation.

Mr. WALSH. I understand the gentleman in advocating this bill does not oppose putting them into agricultural work when it can be done.

Mr. NOLAN. No; but I think there are too many of them; unless you sell the product of the farm in competition with outside farmers. They can not use all the product.

Mr. WALSH. They can use it in the prison.

Mr. NOLAN. But they can not use all that 500 or 600 men will produce, and if it is right to raise agricultural products to be consumed by the inmates of the prisons apply the same principle to the textiles used by the Government.

Mr. WALSH. They can use it in every prison in the country.

Mr. NOLAN. There are only three Federal prisons in the country where this farm produce could be used, but we can use the labor of all the Federal, State, and county prisoners in useful and gainful labor in producing war material.

There is a labor shortage now in some sections of the country, and as millions of men are sent to France, as they will be, this shortage will become serious and the labor of every prisoner in this country will be necessary in some line or another. Let us start in for that time right now, pass this bill, and follow it up immediately with the passage of the Booher bill.

By unanimous consent, Mr. AUSTIN, Mr. SHERLEY, and Mr. FORDNEY were given leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. DYER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I think every man in this House is cordially in sympathy with the argument that the convict should be given every possible consideration, in order that he may go out of the prison door a useful citizen with a trade learned to which he may put his hand to good account. I am, however, irrevocably opposed to this bill. I find myself unable to agree with some of the arguments which have been made against it. Coming from the great textile section of the United States, I do not think that a cotton mill is not good enough for a convict. I can not see how we of New England, at least, who know what cotton-mill labor means, can indorse that argument, even though it is made by those who, like us, are opposed to the bill. My objection is, in part, based on a statement in the committee report itself, which seems to be a fundamental argument with those who favor this measure. There are to be 500 looms in this Atlanta prison. The report states:

> This number of looms would require about 250 employees to operate them in a well-operated private plant, but 450 persons could be employed by this work in the penitentiary, which would make the work on each person very light and give abundant opportunity for outdoor exercise and recreation.

Mr. Chairman, the plan of this bill is to install a cotton plant in Georgia, to put convicts at work in that cotton plant, with the expectation that two of those convicts shall do about the same work that one man or woman in a New England factory is doing to-day. To my mind it is perfectly ridiculous to come before this House with a proposal that only half as much work shall be done by a convict laborer as is the standard for free labor to-day in the most enlightened labor States in the Union. That argument is an affront to the intelligence of the House.

Nor can I see any possible force to the argument that these products will not come into competition with free labor. It is the old question of supply and demand all over again. There is just so much demand for cotton duck or any other commodity. If the convicts make a portion of that cotton duck, there is just so much less to be made by free labor.

It is true that this bill does not go very far. It is true that there will be involved here only the labor of 500 men. But it is the entering wedge that every thoughtful man ought always to watch for and attempt to guard against. This, undoubtedly, is the entering wedge. And, Mr. Chairman, there is no question that it involves competition with free labor. There is no question that the product of the labor of these convicts will come into direct competition with the free labor in the cotton mills of the North, of the South, and of the West. And, as an entering wedge, I submit it seriously menaces free labor wherever it may be in this country. I fear the principles which underlie the bill. No one can foresee what will grow out of their application. I believe every man and woman, employer or employee, who has at heart the interest and prosperity of the textile industry will shudder at the prospect which the passage of this bill will unfold.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is the gentleman in favor of employing prison labor, or of having convicts maintained at the expense of the State?

Mr. ROGERS. I am in favor of employing prison labor in useful vocations. Who is not? I am in favor of having our prisons managed in such a way that the needs of the prison shall be met by its own labor as far as possible; I favor the manufacture by prisoners of their own utensils, shoes and clothing, the raising of their own vegetables, the cooking of their own food. I firmly believe that everything possible that can be done within the walls of the prison shall be done. By these means can the convicts learn useful occupations. Those outside vocations also that do not come into competition with free labor should be encouraged. Roadmaking is the most conspicuous of these. There are others which I could cite.

Now, there are two arguments for this bill. One is that it is necessary for the good of the convicts. That I deny for the reasons just given. Even if it were sound, my first interest must be to protect free labor outside the prison walls. The other is that, as a war emergency, we need cotton duck and can get it in no other way. I can assure the House confidently and with all emphasis that the existing duck-making mills of the United States can supply all the duck that this country will want to-day or will want in the near future. There is no question about the ability of the duck-making concerns of this country to supply the war needs or the peace needs of the country, and we must not vote for this bill under the apprehension that it is needed as a war measure. That is a subterfuge. It has no relation to the true facts. This bill is a threat directed against every free worker in the United States. It should be defeated.

Mr. WEBB. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, in the meeting of the Rules Committee I voted to bring this legislation before the House, because I had the document in my possession which was referred to by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], and was acquainted with the progress of this legislation, especially the appropriation to erect the buildings, and I recognized that it was simply to carry out legislation that had already reached all but the last stages, having the buildings erected and ready for occupancy; this was simply to equip them or to utilize the structure for which we authorized last year the expenditure of $130,000.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state what that document was?

Mr. FESS. House Document No. 1752, Sixty-fourth Congress, second session. The gentleman may have it if he will step here.

Mr. WALSH. I have seen that. I thought the gentleman was referring to another one.

Mr. FESS. I was referring to the document that relates to this measure, not to something else.

I am not going to address the House on the industrial or economic side. As a rule I will oppose the Government doing in industry what private enterprise can do. That is why I opposed the armor-plate bill; also the nitrate bill and measures like them. Neither will I discuss the effect that it might have in the competition between convict labor and free labor. That is a very important item in the discussion of the employment of convict labor. I will allow, however, the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] to take care of that as he has. He has taken the broad view and has shown the attitude of labor toward this measure, which is commendable to labor. But, members of the committee, there is a humanitarian side that ought to have some recognition in a legislative body. We must not exclude from our consideration all elements of the human side in our legislation. If the opposition to this bill should become the law, the poor unfortunates behind the prison bars would be confined under the curse of idleness, which, in my judgment, is the greatest sin that would be enforced upon a human being. The time has come in the humanitarian movement of the world, and I wish to say to my colleagues there is no more far-reaching nor important reform in the last quarter century than prison reform; that when the Government closes the door of the prison upon an unfortunate, the function of the Government is not performed simply by holding him within prison walls. He is denied his freedom for public reasons, it is true, but these include with the punishment the best possible efforts to save him from the life of a criminal to that of a useful citizen. His suffering is demanded as an example, a deterrent to others who might otherwise commit the crime. It is also protection of the public by denying him freedom to repeat the crime. But it must also extend to the welfare of the criminal, if possible, to reform him, because he is still a citizen of the Republic and must be a part of it. It is a duty of the State to by whatever training possible to return him to the public a better man, trained to be a better citizen if possible than when he went to prison. This can never be done if his treatment while in prison hardens his criminal instincts and no step is taken to enable him to face the world again with some hope.

I was strikingly surprised at the utterance of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], whom I love, that this bill would train these men to enter in competition with free labor when they get out. That is precisely what we want to do. We want to open up a vista for the poor devil who has now the condemnation of the world against him, to enable him to look the world in the face when he comes out and be a man again, and be able to do something for which he was trained while he was in prison. [Applause.]

It is the humanitarian side, and not the industrial, which appeals to me. Neither have I been convinced that it is necessarily a war measure. I share in more or less disgust of the attempt to make every issue a war measure. But, aside from that, I will say that universal idleness of prisoners by order of this Government is an injury to the Government and a wrong to the unfortunate that can not be appeased. If a man is imprisoned, he should be employed where it can be done without injury to the public. This Government ought to take steps to make them self-supporting and self-respecting, and thus treat these unfortunate men as subjects for such legislation, so that when the prison doors open for their return to their communities they need not continue the lives of the criminal, but realize that mistakes may be overlooked and they come out again men, not mere convicts. For that purpose the Government should permit them to earn a wage either to support their dependents or serve as a new start in life. For that reason, the humanitarian specially, I shall vote for the bill, as I voted to report it from the Rules Committee. I am quite certain when Members soberly weigh the sordid business impulse over against the human demands not many votes will be cast against it. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, how much time is left?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes on each side.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, the demands as set forth in this bill and those who support it, the hearings and the available facts, show that the measure is not needed or demanded. It has been said here repeatedly and not denied, and stated at other times in this House, that all the duck needed can be furnished and could have been furnished time and again. There is no question as to that fact; there is no need, so far as the humanitarian standpoint is concerned. To put these men in the penitentiary to doing this work has never yet in all the history shown that it has tended to development and improving of their health, but it is conceded by all who know that the open air and an opportunity to work in the open is what is best for those who are sent to prison.

There has been and is to-day plenty of opportunity for that work, not only in building roads which the country needs so much and for which money is expended, but for other needs throughout the country for which there is great demand for outside work. All through the Mississippi Valley, in my own State and other States, there is great need for labor on levee work in connection with the improvement along the Mississippi River and reclaiming of the million of acres of swamp land.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. I will.

Mr. WINSLOW. I have just come in and have not had the benefit of the discussion on the floor, but a neighbor of mine has made the statement that those who are advocating this bill have insisted that there is no opportunity to get duck. I have in my desk and should have here letters from a large carpet manufacturer in the State of Massachusetts, which state that he has been since last January coquetting with the Quartermaster's Department, trying to close an order for this material, of which they will be able to make 5,000 yards a week indefinitely, and could increase it if wanted.

Mr. DYER. That is ample testimony that there is no need of this as a war measure. The labor men of the country do not want this legislation, and I do not care what some gentleman on the floor say, I know that the laboring men, the men who work in the mills, do not want this legislation and are opposed to it.

The precedent would be most dangerous. Here is the great Government of the United States passing a law to enable convicts to go in and work and compete with labor. You are opening up an opportunity to every State in this Union, you are opening up an opportunity for the municipalities of this country to pass similar legislation and thus start the wheels to moving wherein men charged with any crime or misdemeanor will be put to work in competition with free labor, and it is going to result in the greatest possible injury to the entire working force of the country. It is going to be bad for the whole system, and I hope that the bill will not pass. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the debate on this measure has been greatly diversified. Some have told you that the convict should be employed where he could get the most light and air and have suggested aeronautical observation. Others have said that the bill should not be passed because it violates one's own idea of the propriety of public ownership, that it is a branch of public ownership and therefore it should not be agreed to by this committee. Some of the gentlemen have said that it makes the convicts work too much. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] has candidly said that he is opposed to it because it makes them work too little, because it made two convicts do what one man on the outside can do. And, finally, the frank observation is made that the bill should not be passed because the duck-making mills of the country can supply the existing needs, and that the passage of this bill will operate against those owning fabric mills.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of this committee, this bill should be based on a higher idea than the welfare of the duck-making interests of the United States. It is a measure which should have for its purpose the rebuilding of man. It has two material applications—one is that there is a factory at Atlanta Penitentiary all ready for the installation of this machinery.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Why then should the need of duck be urged as an argument in favor of the bill?

Mr. GARD. I was about to come to that. I say there are two material things, and one is that at Atlanta Penitentiary we have a building ready to be equipped with machinery. If we have not the machinery the building is useless.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GARD. No; I have not the time. The other is that the Government is said to need duck, and that as a means of fulfilling that need we are about to install this machinery. Mr. Chairman, I go further than that. I go further than the need, even if it be an immediate need, of producing duck for governmental purposes, even at this essential time. I stand for the principle that there should be work for convicts which will rebuild the convict physically, mentally, and morally, afford him a proper environment for his work, and when his term expires permit him to go back to society as a useful citizen and not as a derelict. It is upon that idea that I think this bill should be supported. It is this principle that is involved. If you take a number of men and put them behind prison bars and place them in what you call the "idle house," in a little while you have not a number of convicts, odious as that name may be, but you have practically a number of insane men, whom the Government must treat in hospitals with but little hope of restoration to reason.

On the other hand, the modern idea is to take care of the unfortunates who have transgressed the rules of society and have been made to suffer incarceration. To him is to be given the employment he can best perform. Some men can be employed on the farm, some on the roads, some in one capacity, and some in another. To say that the result of this employment comes in contact with the products of free labor is absurd. Anything that they do, any potatoes they grow, and furniture they make, any shoes they make are in some very minor degree in conflict with free labor; but, as the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] has well said, this is not something of which free labor is afraid, because free labor, I am sure, has that high ideal in the service of humanity that it wants to rebuild the unfortunate quite as much as those who are not engaged in manual labor, and this is the test. This is the thing the bill does. It will give employment to men in work where they can render effective service, give them good environment, make them helpful citizens, and release them equipped with an occupation so that thy may return to society useful and helpful people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUBEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8938 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DEWALT for five days, to attend to business at home.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the special order for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8938, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 12000, the pension appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the pension appropriation bill, notwithstanding the special order. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in view of the unusual conditions that now prevail and the ruling of the Chair that the Atlanta Penitentiary bill has precedence under the rule, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. CANNON. One moment, if the gentleman will permit, the gentleman from Massachusetts is called home——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Oh, if it is a matter of personal convenience, I withdraw the objection.

Mr. CANNON. He is the chairman of the subcommittee, and I fancy the bill will not take a very great while. It will be finished during the afternoon.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In view of the explanation, and as this appears to be a matter of personal convenience to the gentleman from Massachusetts, I withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask whether there is to be a limitation of time, so that we can have some assurance that the Atlanta Penitentiary bill, which we are laying aside, will be voted upon this afternoon.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I can say to the gentleman that so far as this side of the House is concerned we have no desire to use any time in general debate.

Mr. FESS. What about the other side?

Mr. CANNON. I have some applications for time, but not many. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY], who does not seem to be here, desires some time; but if he is not here we will mark him off.

Mr. GALLIVAN. We will not take up much time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am not inclined to object, but I want to know whether there is any desire to prevent a vote upon the other bill this afternoon?

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, no.

Mr. WALSH. How does the gentleman know that under the five-minute rule we will get to a vote this afternoon upon that bill?

Mr. GALLIVAN. The pension bill is only 19 lines long.

Mr. CANNON. Is it important that the penitentiary bill should be passed to-day?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the appropriation bill is not long and that nobody will have a desire for extended debate, and that we can hold people down to the five-minute rule, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I regret to inject myself again; but I did not know at the time I withdrew the objection that there was to be any general debate upon the pension appropriation bill or that much time was to be consumed. My judgment is that the Atlanta Penitentiary bill should be voted on while the matter is fresh in the minds of the Members of the House. Therefore I object.

MANUFACTURE OF SUPPLIES FOR GOVERNMENT AT ATLANTA PENITENTIARY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects. Under the rule the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8938.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8938, with Mr. RUBEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8938) to equip the United States Penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., for the manufacture of supplies for the use of the Government, for the compensation of prisoners for their labor, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Attorney General of the United States is authorized and directed to establish, equip, maintain, and operate at the United States Penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., a factory or factories for the manufacture of cotton fabrics to supply the requirements of the War and Navy Departments, the Shipping Corporation, cotton duck suitable for tents and other army purposes and canvas for mail sacks and for the manufacture of mail sacks and other similar mail-carrying equipment for the use of the United States Government. The factory or factories shall not be so operated as to abolish any existing Government workshop or curtail the production within its present limits of any such Government workshop.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

"The Attorney General is hereby further authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase or condemnation proceedings, such tracts of land at such points as he may determine, which may be cleared, graded, and cultivated. And the Attorney General is authorized to employ the inmates of the institution herein mentioned under such regulations as he may prescribe in the work of clearing, grading, and cultivation of such acquired tracts of land. The products of any such agricultural development shall be utilized in supplying such correctional institutions as the Attorney General may designate, or in his discretion may be sold."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I believe that amendment should not be adopted.

Mr. GOODALL. What is that?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The amendment providing that the Attorney General is hereby further authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase or condemnation proceedings, such tracts of land at such points as he may determine, which may be cleared, graded, and cultivated. If that amendment goes in the bill, it proves the general allegation made in respect to the purposes of this bill, that it proposes to enter upon a general industrial prison system throughout the United States. This gives power to the Attorney General, not to buy nor to take nor to condemn tracts of land in the vicinity of the Atlanta Penitentiary, but any tracts of land at any points he may determine, which may be cleared, graded, and cultivated. There is a meritorious provision in the amendment later on in regard to farm products for penal institutions, but that does not change the effect of the amendment, which is to give to the Attorney General power to purchase or condemn tracts of land at such points as he may determine, which may be cleared, graded, and cultivated. At the Atlanta Penitentiary? No; anywhere. At the Leavenworth or any other penitentiary? No; at any point he may see fit. He is not limited to these particular institutions, therefore it opens up a wide field and gives to the Attorney General an unnecessary discretion and power as to our correctional institutions.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. WALSH. If that amendment were amended along the line the gentleman suggests, would the gentleman have any objection to it?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will vote against the amendment as it is, but if it is voted in the bill I shall ask to have it amended to provide that these pieces of land shall be in the immediate vicinity of the Atlanta Penitentiary. I have such an amendment to the amendment ready.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. At the McNeil Island Penitentiary, in the State of Washington, for some time the warden of that penitentiary and others have been endeavoring to secure from Congress some $10,000 to buy the rest of the island on which that penitentiary is situated——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would suggest to the gentleman that his course, if he wants to have this power conferred in reference to McNeil Island, would be to introduce an amendment to the section and include McNeil Island along with the United States Penitentiary at Atlanta, and if Leavenworth wants to come in let it come in, or any other section that has a penitentiary.

Mr. WALSH. But you can not get any land in the immediate vicinity of the Atlanta Penitentiary for agricultural purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not know about that.

Mr. WALSH. It was testified by the superintendent of the prison, but it depends upon how you define the word "immediate." If the gentleman means adjacent and adjoining the prison grounds, you can not get it, for you must go several miles away.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is exactly what I mean. It should be in the vicinity of or appurtenant to the Atlanta Penitentiary; otherwise this is a general blanket power we are giving to the Attorney General to locate tracts of grounds anywhere. My judgment is, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment ought to be defeated, because it is far above and beyond the immediate purpose of this bill, the purpose of which is the locating of an industrial institution within the walls of the Atlanta Penitentiary.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the pro forma amendment. I hope the amendment will be permitted to remain in the bill, because this is in the nature of an alternative plan. Where land is available in the vicinity of these institutions, and where it is suitable for this sort of work, it will permit its acquirement by the Government in order that such of the convicts, or all inmates of those institutions that are suited for outdoor agricultural work, may be assigned to that work. Therefore this amendment was put in it, and it is similar to the amendment incorporated in the bill when it was reported in the Sixty-fourth Congress. As I recall the testimony given, in the immediate vicinity of the Atlanta Penitentiary there is no land available which would be suitable for agricultural purposes, but in the general vicinity of both the penitentiary at Atlanta and Leavenworth, and I think the penitentiary in the far West, land could be procured by the Government which could be cleared up, cultivated; and put to useful purposes in the development along agricultural lines. This has been done, as I stated in general debate, in several other States. In my State they have acquired property in the vicinity of what is known as the State farm.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would it not be possible, if this amendment stayed in the bill, for the Attorney General to locate a piece of ground in Florida for the use of the inmates of the Atlanta Penitentiary?

Mr. WALSH. If the Attorney General did that under this paragraph in the bill, when there was land nearer the Federal prison, I would think that he might be more properly an inmate of the institution than the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has already stated, and he seems to be more familiar with the testimony than I am, that there is no land adjacent to the Atlanta Penitentiary that could be available?

Mr. WALSH. I said under a definition of the gentleman's term "immediate vicinity" there is no land immediately adjoining and bounding on the penitentiary grounds which would be suitable, but within a short distance, a few miles, both at Atlanta and, I believe, at Leavenworth, particularly at Leavenworth, there is a large tract of land there, as brought out by the testimony, which was suitable for agricultural purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I know the gentleman, being a good lawyer, knows more about the Atlanta penitentiary than I do.

Mr. WALSH. Well, every good lawyer has to know something about penitentiaries, but not always from having been an inmate thereof.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that for the reasons which I have stated, and which I trust will be more intelligently and perhaps more forcibly supplemented by other members of the committee, this amendment will not be voted out of the bill. That is all I have to say with reference to the views of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] in opposing this provision. It permits the alternative, and, to my mind, it permits the more desirable view being put into operation, namely, to get these men out into the open air, to keep them at work in agricultural pursuits, and the crops which they raise can be used to furnish food supply to the penitentiaries, reformatories, and the other correctional institutions operated under Government auspices. And while it may be said they would come in competition with free labor, I think that the matter of competition in these war times may be waived, because we all know that the demand for food far exceeds the visible supply.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I voted yesterday in favor of reporting this bill out. Ordinarily I am very much opposed to this character of legislation. I have never believed it fair to free laboring men to enact such legislation as will put their product into competition with convict labor. For that reason I have always opposed this character of legislation. Yesterday and to-day we were told that the President of the United States wants this legislation, because they need cotton duck and cotton cloth in connection with the prosecution of this war. I know they need it, and I know they have been needing it for quite a while.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I have not the time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Have we any letter from the President saying that this is needed?

Mr. BLAND. I think there has been a letter written.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Who has it?

Mr. BLAND. I do not know. I have not. I have not been so honored with an epistle from the President of the United States. However, I am reliably informed that he has expressed a desire for this legislation. I have so far voted for every measure the President or the administration has asked for, if they claimed it was for the prosecution of the war, and I intend to continue to do so. I am also informed that the American Federation of Labor and the heads of labor organizations have affirmatively given their sanction to this legislation. Is that true, Mr. Chairman of the committee?

Mr. GARD. I would like to state that the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] said that the bill was entirely agreeable to organized labor, as I understand it.

Mr. BLAND. Is there testimony before your committee to the effect that union labor is in favor of this bill at this time? I was told yesterday that labor favored this bill.

Mr. WEBB. My recollection is that a year ago, when we had this bill up, and when it was reported favorably by the committee, but when it did not pass because we did not have a Calendar Wednesday, Mr. Holden, representing union labor, appeared before the Judiciary Committee and indorsed it.

Mr. NOLAN. I will state that, as to the proposition at McNeils Island, Mr. Morrison, the secretary of the Federation of Labor, approved it, and Mr. Grant Hamilton, also representing union labor, appeared before the committee and made an exhaustive argument in favor of it, which appears in this hearing.

Mr. BLAND. In supporting the rule yesterday I acted upon that theory. I come from a labor district, and they regard me as their friend and I have always tried to be their friend. Since the President of the United States wants this legislation, and since he believes it is essential to the conduct of this war, and since organized labor and other laboring men of this country are in favor of it, I see no reason why I should not willingly give it my support. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that it is treating labor right to take the products of the Federal prisons and put them in free competition with the products of free men; but as I understand this bill, it provides for the products of this prison, which the Federal Government will run itself, to be used by the Government. That being true, I can not see any objection to its passage.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] is recognized.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, for four years and a half I was general superintendent of prison labor in the State of Massachusetts. The legislature of that State in the year 1877 decided to abolish all contract labor in prisons, and I was appointed by Hon. Oliver Ames, governor, as general superintendent to put the new law into effect, which was to provide for the labor of prisoners outside of contract work in the State prison, all State reformatories for men and women, and county houses of correction throughout the State. The same work was done as formerly in the institutions, only the contract system was abolished. The prisoners were employed by the day. However, they did but very little work, and I never knew any prison laborers that would do a great amount of work. The State obtained but very little money for the product, and they were obliged to provide for the deficiencies, because the prisoners did not wish to exert themselves. My duties did not include the discipline of the prisoners. Some of the county institutions had large areas of farming lands, and the labor in these institutions proved helpful to the prisoners and financially showed good results. To put prisoners to work on machinery will prove, in my judgment, absolutely a loss of efficiency. These men and women are not of a mechanical disposition of mind or character. The party now in power may bring in some new kind of a scheme here—and I know the party on the other side of the House seem to have any number of schemes which they evolve nearly every day—they may bring in some new kind of a scheme to get labor out of people who do not work.

They may succeed with the proposition contained in this bill. But I want to say that the only way to employ prisoners is to employ them on farm work. You can not employ them with any satisfaction working on machinery. Most of the men who become prisoners, except those few select ones that get into Atlanta because of having robbed banks and committed similar offenses, do not want to work for a living. The moment they get into prison they begin to connive and maneuver to discover how they can get a living without work when they get out. And they plan all their schemes along the line of avoiding any labor for the purpose of obtaining a living. They think the world owes them a living and they do not want to work.

This scheme for establishing a plant at Atlanta for manufacturing cotton-duck cloth is one of the most outrageous and chimerical of anything I have ever had brought to my attention. There is no call for it. There are plenty of mills throughout the country who manufacture duck who have been trying to obtain contracts with the Government without being successful in obtaining the same.

I will add here that while I live in the city of Fall River, Mass., where I reside, which has a larger number of cotton spindles than any city in the United States, none of these mills manufacture cotton duck, so that I do not base my opposition to this measure on any political, personal, or local grounds; but there are many other manufacturing plants throughout New England who should not be subjected to the competition which this measure foreshadows. I presume many uninformed persons believe that anybody can successfully work in a cotton mill, and many of these theoretical persons never saw a cotton mill in operation.

Now they have got a scheme where they want to do something or other that is conceived in somebody's mind as practical, and so they have started out to have a new scheme for a duck factory so they can make the canvas bags for the use of the Post Office Department and provide cotton duck for the use of the Army. Now, if we are to have an Army of millions of men, all the duck made in Atlanta will not cover many of these men unless the prisoners at Atlanta are more advanced in mechanical genius and adaptability than any prisoners that I have ever seen or heard of. As I have heretofore stated, I served four years and a half as superintendent of prison labor in the State of Massachusetts and visited all the prisons of the State and established all the industries in them, and did everything I could to accomplish something for prison labor, and I never was criticized for any shortcoming. My friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has, of course, read a great deal, and theoretically he seems to be very much interested in prisons. But I was in these institutions every day when I was general superintendent, and I have never been in any prison since; and, as I have stated, I served in that capacity four and one-half years and went from prison to prison and attended to the business of those institutions, but I never had the curiosity that a great many people have in this country to visit a prison simply for the sake of a visit, simply in order that I may see how prisoners appear. [Laughter.] Massachusetts never has its prisoners wear stripes nor does it allow corporal punishments. Its reformatories are models of their kind. And so far as I have known anything about labor men, organized labor has been steadily opposed to projects of this kind until this democratic scheme was evolved, and when this present democratic scheme was brought up many of these men prominent in labor organizations have indorsed the project and say, "We like it. It tastes good. It spells democracy." Therefore, they say they like it and they want to swallow it. [Laughter.]

I believe that the money that will be spent in this project will be wasted, and while money may be plentiful and easily disposed of, it is the hard-earned money of the honest business man and laborer outside of prison that is to be recklessly and wastefully expended, and it is almost a crime to use the money provided for in this bill in such an experiment when this Congress and the executive departments are providing for new issues of bonds and new methods of taxation to burden the American people and deprive them of their means of existence.

I would not vote for this bill simply because the President has indorsed it, because he might change his mind upon it. He has many burdens to carry and it is not unreasonable for him to say that if he had more time to consider bills he might have a different view. I voted against the rule providing for this infamous, unnecessary bill, and hope it may be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington moves to amend the committee amendment, as follows: Page 2, line 12, after the word "institution," strike out the words "herein mentioned" and insert the words "and other Federal penitentiaries."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is that offered as an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is offered as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I suspect that this amendment is subject to a point of order, because the rule provides for the consideration of this Atlanta Penitentiary bill only, and the amendment provides for the possible extension of activities at another Federal penitentiary.

The thing that I can not quite understand is why there was slipped into the sundry civil bill a year ago an appropriation of $129,500 for the erection of certain shop buildings and factories and appurtenances at the Atlanta, Ga., Penitentiary and at the same time it has been impossible to secure consideration in the Committee on Appropriations, or even on the floor of this House, of a bill to appropriate the comparatively small sum of $10,000 to enlarge the McNeil Island grounds so that the prisoners there can produce their own garden truck and supplies.

The McNeil Island Penitentiary is famed as one of the model penal institutions of the country. The work performed there by the Federal prisoners is of the order outlined by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS]; that is, they do everything that can be done to keep the prison and the men inside going. I have heard the debate here on the proposition to put a paper mill there. If a paper mill should ever be put at the McNeil Island Penitentiary, with the swift waters of the narrows of Puget Sound running on both sides of it, the paper mill will be an experimental proposition of doubtful value. I think this textile mill at Atlanta is a doubtful proposition instead of a revenue producer; it is more likely to be a money loser. True, it would utilize the time of the men, but that is hardly a good reason for calling the plan a war necessity. This is a poor time to appropriate another million dollars for either experimental or prison humanitarian purposes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can anyone conceive of anybody working in prison at work that can be done outside where that work done inside to that extent does not take that much labor that can be done outside from the free laborer?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Undoubtedly not; but men in a prison should be entitled to do all the work possible to keep the prison going. Few object to that. They might work at building military roads.

Mr. Chairman, we are putting the Government into business pretty fast all along the line, and every step we take along that line calls for a great big appropriation of the people's money which we have no right to appropriate either so freely or so wildly. This million will go out of Uncle Sam's war chest at once, and it will be a long time before any cotton duck comes out of that prison for war use. When it does it will have cost the Government twice what it could have been made for outside. I suppose the next step will be to commandeer some looms on the outside now at work.

We have a Government military saw mill out West, and the cost of getting out spruce in that mill is more than the cost of getting it out privately. Certain overhead charges are not counted at that.

I think most gentlemen here will agree that that is usually the case in the effort on the part of the Government to go into business. The Government can not save money, and it will be that way in this Atlanta cotton-duck mill. It is that way in the Government spruce saw mills; it is that way on the Government railroad in Alaska; it is that way in the case of other Government activities carried on under certain disguises, and it will be that way in making cotton duck in the Atlanta Penitentiary.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I agree with all those who have expressed themselves in favor of profitable and upbuilding occupations for prisoners, and for everybody else for that matter. So it is not necessary for me to argue that point. There is a phase of this question, however, which seems to me to be worthy of consideration. Anybody who knows anything about the production of machinery in this country knows that it is well-nigh impossible to buy a machine for any purpose with any reasonable time set for its delivery. Anybody who is familiar with machinery knows perfectly well that no private owner, skilled in the art, would expect to equip a factory in the next year with looms to make any sort of textile fabric. All the looms which can be produced for months ahead in this country have long since been on order. The call is for more textile machinery than is being made, and yet the Government presumes to come to us asking for an appropriation to equip a new business with machinery which can not be found in the market, a preposterous industrial idea at the outset. Unless the Government is prepared to say that it will rob the private concern of its rights and its machinery there is no merit in the opinion that the Government can forthwith equip a plant to make any textile product.

This bill has been brought forward as a war measure. The supposition is that the Government needs duck, and whatever bagging, and so forth, are provided for in the bill. If the Government needs duck, one would think it would buy it when the chance is afforded. But, lo and behold! I have here a collection of letters which represent the ideas and experience of a concern in Worcester, Mass., owned by Mr. M. J. Whittall, the largest private manufacturer of carpets in the United States, a concern of the highest commercial rating, well able to perform its contracts and willing to make duck for the United States Government. As far back as last January this concern, after being urged to undertake the task, tried to close contracts with the Quartermaster's Department to make duck, but up to this time they have not been able to do so, although they have several times offered, after four weeks of preparation, to turn out 5,000 yards a week. If that department had seen fit last January to accept Mr. Whittall's offer, our Army could have been in possession of more than 100,000 yards of the very material for which they now want to build and equip a factory at the Atlanta prison. If the Government pretends it is going at this matter as a commercial proposition, it is easy enough to see that there is "a nigger in the woodpile" somewhere.

Furthermore it is a rank imposition on our people in this day when we are peddling out billions of dollars and expect to peddle out billions more to be appropriating even the insignificant sum of $1,000,000 for the purpose of doing something at some time—God only knows when—in the face of the fact that we can have the same work done at once by somebody else; and that, too, by people who will run machinery now made and on hand, and a concern, too, which is contributing very largely to the funds from which these billions of dollars will be paid.

Why should the Government go into this duck business? They do not know how to make duck any more than they have known how to make aircraft, or cannon, and other things that they have undertaken to specify and direct. In fact, they have no training along this line. Yet they come to the Congress of the United States and ask it to appropriate a cool million to undertake a new job for which there is no good place, in the face of the perfect willingness of reputable manufacturers to make the same material.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do I understand my friend from Massachusetts to say that this private concern in Worcester can begin to turn out duck after four weeks' time?

Mr. WINSLOW. If I can get the time I will be delighted to have the Clerk read the communications I have here, which show that fact.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINSLOW. As soon as I heard of the existence of this bill I sent a telegram to Mr. Whittall, of Worcester, Mass., with the result that the letter about to be read was sent to me. I ask the Clerk to read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

WORCESTER, MASS., April 30, 1918.

Hon. SAMUEL E. WINSLOW,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR COL. WINSLOW: We are in receipt of your telegram and have answered as per confirmation inclosed.

We are inclosing copy of our letter of January 5 to the Quartermaster Department at Washington, copy of which we also mailed you at that time, and which you no doubt still have in your file.

To this letter we have never had a reply, nor have we had any replies to our letters of April 15 and April 18, copies of which we inclose.

With kind regards, we are,

Very truly, yours,

M. J. WHITTALL.

Mr. WINSLOW. This is the telegram referred to in that letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

WORCESTER, MASS., April 30, 1918.

Col. S. E. WINSLOW,
711 New Hampshire Avenue NW., Washington, D. C.:

We have offered to make duck at the same price as last, plus advance of price in cotton yarn, and so far offer has not been accepted. See letter.

M. J. WHITTALL.

Mr. WINSLOW. Now, will the Clerk please read these letters?

The Clerk read as follows:

JANUARY 5, 1918.

Col. H. J. HIRSH,
Quartermaster's Purchasing and Manufacturing Office,
Eighteenth and D Streets NW., Washington, D. C.

DEAR COLONEL: We are sending you by Adams Express the first sample of No. 4 duck, which we have just made, and we are ready to go ahead and fill the order for 10,000 yards of this quality, provided the sample meets with your satisfaction, and also providing that Catlin & Co. will give us the balance of the cotton yarn to make it. We have been on order with them for 10,000 pounds since November 24, and all we have received so far from them is a little over 1,000 pounds, and this came to us by express.

We have 20 looms that we can make this quality of duck on. So far we have only changed 2 of these looms over from carpets, but we can change the other 18, provided that you give us the order and we can procure the cotton.

The cotton yarn from which we made this sample, and for the 10,000 pounds that we have an order for, costs us 46 cents a pound, and we are charging you 70 cents per yard for the cloth, whereas the quotation which we gave you last summer of 70 cents a yard was based on the cost of cotton yarn to us at that time, at 36 cents a pound. We are willing, however, to take an additional order for duck, with the understanding that whatever the cotton yarn costs us over the 46 cents price of to-day shall be added to the price that we shall charge per yard for the duck.

We might further say that it would not pay us to change these looms over unless you can assure us of a good order, as it is a very expensive operation, and we will have to weave many thousands of yards of duck before we can cover this extra expense.

We can weave about 5,000 yards a week, but we could only reach this amount gradually. To illustrate: The first week we can weave 500 yards; the second week, 1,000 yards; the third week, 1,500 yards; and so continue up to the 5,000 yards a week limit, so please let us know what your pleasure would be relative to an additional order, as we have considerable preparations to make in the way of securing options on sufficient cotton yarn and the work of changing over the additional looms.

We can also weave the 12.9 duck, which, we understand, is 30½ inches wide, or any other fabric ranging in width from 22 inches to 27 inches, especially a fabric calling for less weight of cotton per yard, which naturally would make the cost to the Government less.

If you require khaki color, we can do this work for you, as we have a fully equipped dye house of our own, wherein we can dye the cotton yarn in skeins, which, we think, is quite equal, if not better, than dyeing the cloth by the piece. Our dye house is now dyeing worsted and woolen yarn for Government use.

We wrote you on January 1 that we thought that our looms could be adapted to the manufacture of a great many textile fabrics, providing that the Government would let us know what they require, but we have not yet had the pleasure of your reply.

If there is any further information that you desire and if it would be of any benefit to the Government or ourselves to make a personal trip to Washington, we will do so, provided you will make a time for an appointment.

Will you kindly advise us promptly relative to the sample of duck which we are sending you and an additional order on same.

Very truly, yours,

M. J. WHITTALL.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. There are two other letters to be read, but I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to know whether the information regarding this offer was conveyed to the Government?

Mr. WINSLOW. These letters were written to the Quartermaster's Department, not to me.

Mr. TOWNER. The letter of which this is a copy was sent to the Quartermaster's Department?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. What can the gentleman say regarding the responsibility of these men to make their offers good?

Mr. WINSLOW. It is only a question of how many millions they own. They are of the highest rating provided for in commercial agency books.

Mr. TOWNER. In other words, then, there is no question at all about their ability to fulfill their offer to the Government?

Mr. WINSLOW. That is beyond all question. There are two more letters which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

APRIL 15, 1918.

Col. H. J. HIRSCH,
Quartermaster's Purchasing and Manufacturing Office,
Eighteenth and D Streets NW., Washington, D. C.

DEAR COLONEL: We have made one shipment of about 2,400 yards of No. 4 duck on our order No. 71–B, and have about 1,200 yards or more ready for delivery.

We can put in 20 more looms on this fabric, and will be glad to take an order for 100,000 to 200,000 yards at a price that will be the difference between the cost of cotton yarn on our former contract and the price which we have to pay for cotton yarn to-day.

We have several inquiries from cotton-yarn houses and have a promise from one house for delivery starting latter part of June or the first part of July on the yarn, and this would mean deliveries of duck possibly the latter part of August, with the supposition that the yarn reaches us promptly from the spinner.

We wrote you under date of January 5, and are inclosing copy of our letter to which we can not find your reply. Will you not take this matter up quickly as we have a chance to sell all these looms to a Philadelphia party. We will not sell them if the Government requires them for duck, and this is something we would like to know as quickly as possible.

Very truly, yours, M. J. WHITTALL.

APRIL 18, 1918.

Col. H. J. HIRSCH,
Quartermaster's Purchasing and Manufacturing Office,
Eighteenth and D Streets NW., Washington, D. C.

DEAR COLONEL: Referring to our letter of April 15, to which we have not yet had a reply, it has taken us a full week to secure options and time of delivery from the cotton-yarn people, and we have found one mill who can deliver up to 200,000 pounds of 7.4-ply yarn commencing June 1. This is the Alpine Cotton Mills at Morgantown, N. C., through their agency, the Erwin Yarn Co.

We are inclosing a sample of this yarn so that you can see for yourself it is of the very best quality. The lowest quotation given us on this yarn is 66 cents per pound, which is exactly 20 cents per pound higher than the contract we made with Catlin & Co. for the 10,000 yards of duck which we are now delivering to you at 70 cents a yard.

We will be very much pleased to accept an order up to 200,000 yards, delivery, as mentioned in our previous letter, to commence about September 1.

As there is 15 ounces of cotton to the yard of No. 4 duck, this would mean 19 cents a yard more on the difference in the price of cotton yarn, bringing quotation on the duck to 89 cents a yard, which would give us a profit of about 10 per cent or a little under.

Immediately upon advice from you we will have these looms set up and start to work on them. We would like to have some information from you as soon as possible as we have had an offer from another party to buy the looms.

We trust, therefore, that you will give our letter your quick attention. With kind regards, I am,

Very truly, yours, ——— ———.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINSLOW. The letters, gentlemen, were read not for my edification but for those who did not have this information. I think it is time to begin to go to the bottom of bills which are offered here. We find a letter written as late as the 18th of April, 1918, covering correspondence from January 5, 1918, and during all that time not only has the writer of the letter failed to get any response whatever from the Quartermaster Department, but meanwhile cotton yarn has gone up 19 cents to a yard of duck, and to-day we have a bill brought in here with the statement that it is a war measure in order that the Government may get duck. Some one said a few moments ago that the President had written a letter in which he favored this bill. I do not know whether he has or not, but I hope he has not. I have recently followed him up on one letter and down on another, and I find the backward somersault is not intended for one of my shape. [Laughter and applause.]

The idea is simply this, that we had better get down to business. The people of the land are beginning to get their ears to the ground and they are hearing noises which sound like some funny things going on around Washington, and those of us who go home from now on will be asked questions unlike those we have been asked hitherto. We will have to tell them why things are not, when people supposed they were. Is it not a very good time now, when we find that a bill has been brought in here under a misapprehension—to be kind—calling for a simple million, to refuse to pass the bill so long as it only comes as a war measure, in order that we may not only save the million but get the duck quicker? For my part, I hope that the bill will be beaten whether as a war measure or a commercial undertaking.

When you talk about the bill as a matter of humanitarian interest it has no business to become a part of the legislation of this House at this session by general agreement. I think it would be nothing but rank policy for this Congress to legislate in favor of this bill which takes a million to establish a new line of enterprise, difficult in itself, and which apparently is not needed, and which will add nothing to the production possibilities of the machinery of the country. I dare express the hope that we will look upon this legislation in the light in which it was presented, namely, as a war measure, as a business proposition. We here have a chance to assure the country, even at this late day, that there is enough nerve left here to sometimes begin to analyze bills, in our effort to save some of the country's money which we have long since been so lavishly expending. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I hope very much that the amendment proposing to strike out the section providing for the purchase of land will not be adopted. I do not think the Judiciary Committee would have reported the bill favorably without this provision. It will be utilized for the growing of cotton, grain, potatoes, and so forth, for the use of the Government and the prisoners. I hope the provision will not be stricken out. We are trying to provide diversified work for all the prisoners. We can not put them all in factories, but we thought if the Government would buy enough farm land it would be a humanitarian act and profitable to the Government.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. Would this include the alien enemies interned there? Would they be put to work also?

Mr. WEBB. If they are prisoners it would.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I notice the amendment to which the gentleman has called attention, but I do not find that there is any limit either in amount of money or quantity of land, or any given location of land. What price is to be paid for the land, and how much is it—a million, a million and a half, or two millions?

Mr. WEBB. We could not give the location of the land, because every landowner would jump his price up immediately. We thought it would be better for the Attorney General's Department to go out and buy it, select it in the most suitable location.

Mr. CANNON. There is no limit. There is as much limit to spend ten millions as there is to spend one.

Mr. WEBB. There is no appropriation in the bill; it is only an authorization. There will be no appropriation until the gentleman's committee comes to handle it.

Mr. CANNON. But anything would be in order. Is there any amount appropriated in the bill that is available?

Mr. WEBB. No.

Mr. CANNON. Nothing available but a general authorization without minimum and without maximum. It may be a township or it may be a county.

Mr. WEBB. That is all right if the gentleman wants to limit it; the committee will accept an amendment. This is not our legislation alone; it now belongs to the House.

Now, what I want to call attention to is this: When our committee had its hearings we had before us this letter from the War Industries Board of the Council of National Defense, the committee on supplies of cotton-goods section, written by Albert L. Scott. I do not know anything about the troubles of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW]; I do not know that his man has duck that the Government wants. In fact, I conclude that he has not got it, because the thing the Government is in great need of is heavy duck for Army, Navy, and Shipping Board use.

Here is a letter written to the Attorney General:

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I want to read this letter first:

I wish to urge upon you the necessity of increasing the supply of looms in the country capable of producing numbered duck at the earliest possible moment. The demand for such duck for paulins, escort-wagon covers, transport covers, and for the Emergency Fleet Corporation is far beyond the capacity of the country to supply.

If the Atlanta Penitentiary could install 500 looms to produce these goods it would tend to greatly ease a very tense situation.

Generally speaking, the quantity of numbered duck yet to be purchased from an already overburdened industry is over 31,000,000 yards.

On February 26 the committee had the following letter, addressed to me as chairman of the committee by the Attorney General:

The situation is this: The committee on supplies of the Council of National Defense says that there will be a very large shortage of heavy cotton duck, and that is one of the important war problems to provide an increased supply; that the Government departments face a deficit of from five to six million yards during 1918, in addition to the requirements of the Navy and the Shipping Corporation, which in themselves are heavy. The committee says that if the Atlanta Penitentiary could install 500 looms to produce cotton duck it would tend to greatly ease a very tense situation.

I called up this cotton-goods section of the Council of National Defense a day or two ago and asked the gentleman in charge, Mr. Bailey, what the situation was now. I read him this letter, and he said it is just as tense now as it ever was. Pray tell me why it is not a war measure? I take the position that it is a good measure, and men ought not to get up on the floor of this House and object to the convicts of the country getting into some gainful occupation for the Government during this war because it might come in conflict with some manufacturer from their section. I have 125 cotton mills in my district, more than any other district in the United States, and they are not protesting against this bill, which the President so urgently indorses.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I beg to differ with the gentleman, but I have more than that in mine. I have 114 in one city.

Mr. WEBB. This is a humanitarian bill. It is recommended by the American Federation of Labor, by the Council of National Defense, by the Attorney General, and by the President of the United States, and I can not see why all this fight should be waged against a measure as to which no one seems to lodge a real, just objection. All say that these prisoners ought to be employed, and some say put them on a farm. A gentleman has to have a mighty fine pair of metaphysical scissors to show me the difference between competition with a farmer and with a manufacturer. If the convict grows a bushel of potatoes and either eats or sells them, he is in competition to that extent with the farmer; and if he makes a yard of duck and the Government uses it, he is to that extent in competition with the man who is making duck. Will somebody please point out what ought to be done with these 1,400 men? We had four of the best-qualified men in the country go over this situation and recommend to this Congress what should be done, and we are carrying out their recommendations. It seems to me that men ought not to use the selfish argument. I have yet to hear from the first manufacturer in America who objects to this bill. I take it they are too big for that sort of little business, especially when the country is demanding for the Army and the Navy and the Shipping Board and for covered wagons this very sort of goods and the trade can not meet the demand. It ought to be made by somebody, and we have the men, 1,400 of them, and why should they not work to supply the Government with one of these very necessary war materials, in which everybody agrees there is a deficit of 6,000,000 yards?

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GOODALL. I want to say something about the looms owned by Mr. Whittell. I have been in his factory, and they made the heaviest kind of duck in the world. In Heaven's name, why does not the Government let him make that duck?

Mr. WEBB. You tell him to go down to the Council of National Defense. They make the contracts.

Mr. GOODALL. How about the letters?

Mr. PLATT. Does not the gentleman think that the Quartermaster General's office ought to answer the letters?

Mr. WEBB. Of course they ought to answer the letters.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman knows the reason why the Government does not get a lot of these things. It is because the Government does not proceed on business principles and because the Government has not a competent Secretary of War.

Mr. WEBB. I deny emphatically the suggested incompetency of our able Secretary of War. Men who want contracts usually come here and see the men who make the contracts. They do not write about what machines they have and what they possibly can do, and so forth, but they come down here and tell them what they can do and close their contracts.

Mr. BURNETT. He ought to get his Congressman to do it.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; Mr. WINSLOW could do that and do it well, no doubt.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. When this bill was introduced and brought into the House it was claimed by the advocates of the measure that it was a war measure. Now it is based on humanitarian grounds. For Heaven's sake hurry up and pass the bill, or we will have a letter from the White House saying that the psychological conditions are such that they demand the passage of the bill. All sorts of excuses are brought in here for a bill that has no merit. There has been no merit yet offered for this bill. There is every evidence that the Government has made no attempt at all to obtain duck from the cotton factories of the country to-day. I do not believe the gentlemen on the Democratic side of this House realize just what they are doing. I want to call their attention to what they have done and what they are doing. Out of a little over 32,000,000 spindles in the country in the cotton mills, about 55 per cent are located in the South. If any gentleman in this House will take the census report, he will find that the average wage scale in the cotton mills south of Mason and Dixon's line was 86 cents a day, while the average wage scale in the cotton mills north of that line was at the time of taking the census $1.42 a day.

Mr. GOODALL. And shorter hours.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; and shorter hours in the North than in southern mills. About the lowest scale of wages of any important industry in the country, and at the same time, when the census was taken, our Democratic friends were shouting themselves hoarse for free trade, free trade on everything—and you have come pretty near getting it. The imports into the United States for the last year were the greatest in value of any year in our history by nearly a billion dollars. The average ad valorem is 7 per cent on imports the last year, and just in seven more short jumps you will have free trade. I visited a cotton mill in a town in Mississippi four or five years ago, and while going through the mill I saw labor employed in making cotton goods. I saw hauled to the door of that factory cotton raised in that county in which that mill was located, Jones County, Miss., brought there by the farmers and sold by them to the factory. There was American labor employed in that mill in the State of Mississippi converting the raw material into the finished product, a very happy situation, indeed. I went to the depot to secure transportation to my home in Michigan, and at the depot I saw cotton being loaded on cars to be shipped out of the city of Laurel, Jones County, Miss. I made inquiry as to where that cotton was being shipped to and found it was going to Belgium, going to New Orleans to be put on board ships to be transported to Belgium. I came home, my friends, and I investigated and I wrote to the American consul in Belgium and found that the wage in the cotton mills in Belgium was 18 cents a day, and the highest wage paid out of 12,000 people in the cotton mills in Belgium on investigation was 38 cents a day. I examined our imports and I found we had imported that year from Europe $71,000,000 worth of manufactured cotton goods. Free trade! Raw cotton raised in the State of Mississippi by American labor, getting the American scale of wages, transported to Europe, where it found cheaper labor, brought right back, and let me go further. I went that very day to a store in the city of Laurel, Miss., and I made inquiry for imported goods, and I found goods in that store in the city of Laurel, Miss., imported from Belgium. Right under my observation there was cotton raised by American labor transported to Belgium to foreign 18 cents per day labor and brought back and sold through the stores of Laurel, Miss., to the very farmer who raised the cotton, and yet you are shouting yourself hoarse for free trade on cotton, and now you want to establish prison labor to come in competition with your 18,000,000 spindles in the South.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me go a little further. Gentlemen, if you will investigate you will find that high-class duck is not made totally of American-grown cotton. It is made largely of the long-staple cotton, imported Egyptian cotton, the high-grade cotton.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman's statement concerning the sale of imported cotton goods in this country interested me, and I wondered if the gentleman had any figures showing the amount of American-made cotton goods sold in foreign countries?

Mr. FORDNEY. I did have, sir; and I can state truthfully that it was a mere trifle at that time as compared with imported cotton goods.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman from North Carolina tells me that certain cotton mills in his State have made fortunes in the sale of cotton to China and other countries.

Mr. FORDNEY. I do not think there is a cotton spindle in the State which I call my home.

Mr. KEATING. No; I said North Carolina.

Mr. FORDNEY. I am not a North Carolinean, thank God.

Mr. KEATING. I said the gentleman from North Carolina; the gentleman misunderstood me. I did not charge the gentleman up against the State of North Carolina.

Mr. FORDNEY. No; but I love the boys from North Carolina.

Mr. KEATING. But the gentleman from North Carolina, which is a cotton-manufacturing State, tells me there is a vast quantity of cotton goods being manufactured in that State which is sold abroad.

Mr. FORDNEY. There are now very great quantities, because the cotton mills of this country are practically taxed to their limit, both cotton mills and woolen mills, so far as they are able to obtain raw materials, because, my friend, war has brought about an abnormal condition which now prevails, but in normal times our imports of cotton goods far exceed our exports of cotton goods.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think if the Government in exercising its war powers had commandeered two or three of the cotton mills in North Carolina or elsewhere it could have met the cotton-duck deficiency?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; but everybody on the face of the earth who has a teaspoonful of brains in his noddle above his eyes knows that the Government can not do anything as cheaply or as economically as individuals can do it. Everybody knows that it costs the Government two or three times as much to do anything as it costs the individual or a set of individuals to do the same work.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. In a moment. Only three days ago I was in the War Department and was told that men out here at Camp Meigs, where the camp is just about being completed, are receiving $12 a day. Any man who can use a saw who is not even a practical carpenter is paid $12 a day. I love to see men obtain good wages. The price of everything we consume, both in food and clothing, is excessively high, and the poor people ought to enjoy as much of the prosperity of the country because of this great war as people of wealth do. I am opposed to great profits during the time of this great war, when our boys are suffering on the battle fields of Europe, but notwithstanding everybody engaged in business of every conceivable kind is trying to make profit. So it goes without saying that wages are high, but the Government never has and never will operate any great industry in this country as economically and as efficiently as the individual or a set of individuals can.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired. The Chair desires to say, before he recognizes anyone else, that he has been very liberal in this debate, and that the debate has long since been exhausted on the pending amendment. The Chair desires to see if he can straighten the parliamentary situation out. There is pending a committee amendment, and to that an amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington, and upon that a point of order has been reserved. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin desires to press the point of order?

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chair makes the point of regular order and calls upon me to press or withdraw my reservation of the point of order, I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that the question as to additional acreage to the penitentiary at McNeil Island, Wash., has been a subject under consideration for the last two or three years by the Committee on Appropriations. This question of increased acreage was not given any consideration by the commission that was appointed two years ago to investigate the question as to how the Government could most profitably utilize prison labor in its three penitentiaries.

Under the circumstances, Mr. Chairman, I feel constrained to make the point of order on the ground that it is not germane.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman withhold it?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will withhold it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I realize that the point of order is well taken. Rather than endeavor to enlarge the scope of this bill, I am convinced that if this reckless appropriation of money is to continue I can offer a bill to provide for the establishment of a Government salmon cannery at McNeils Island, and the identical argument, both humanitarian and war emergency, put forward in behalf of this bill can be used in behalf of that, and the indorsement of the President, which will, of course, be necessary, should easily be secured. Besides, canned salmon has gone up to an unheard-of price, and neither the civilians of the United States nor the Army or the Navy can get as much salmon as they need. Now, will such a bill as that have the indorsement of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee as a war measure?

Mr. WEBB. The committee will have to consider it, I will say to my friend, before I can indorse it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Identically the same arguments would apply.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman would run against the same point of order, though.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The same wording of the rule that brought up the Atlanta Penitentiary cotton-factory bill will suffice as a rule for a McNeils Island salmon cannery.

Mr. WEBB. Let the gentleman introduce the bill and we will give consideration to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. With the permission of the House, I will withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. BLACK. I object, Mr. Chairman. Let us decide this amendment first, and then go to another paragraph.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, we had some tacit understanding here providing that there would be some liberal debate under the five-minute rule. The debate that has been proceeding here has been all bona fide, and I think the ranking member of the Committee on the Judiciary ought to be recognized.

Mr. BLACK. I think so, too, and I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman is the ranking Republican on the committee and has not addressed the House. I will ask that after he finishes speaking we take a vote on the amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I supported this bill in the committee and I intend to support it here. The question of whether this is a war measure or not does not concern me at all. It did not concern me when considering it in the committee. Here is the situation: We have a building down there at Atlanta erected for the purpose of a cotton mill. It is there and we ought to make use of it. There are a large number of prisoners at that point. The prison officials tell us they have no way of employing them. It is not only inhuman but barbarous to have them in idleness. It has been suggested we ought to employ them upon a farm or upon the roads. Now, while that can be done to some extent, anyone who knows anything about prison matters knows that that is not practical as to all prisoners. A few of them may be so employed, but it is not the best way to employ prisoners. We put men in prison for the purpose of reforming them, or at least that ought to be our object. Society should not be vindictive. You take a man and work him on the road, and as a rule you humiliate him in the most outrageous fashion. I have seen prisoners at work in the South upon the roads, and if there could be anything more degrading it is hard to imagine what it can be. I have seen there gangs of shackled prisoners, followed by men with rifles or clubs to keep them in line, gazed at by every passer-by. The same will in a measure be true if you attempt to work the men in the Atlanta prison on a farm. It is not possible to so employ them near the prisons, because there is no land available for that purpose near there, and you would have to shift them from the prison to the farm and back from time to time, and thus constantly expose them to the public gaze. Such a course as that certainly does not appeal to me.

We have in the State of Minnesota a prison system in which we take much pride. The system has been strongly commended by the highest authorities on prison reforms, and I can not help but feel that it is a proper system. We have a farm and employ as many on that as we conveniently can, but have other industries for them. We manufacture the binding twine that is used on the farms in that State, and sometimes we have a surplus. We employ them also in the making of farm machinery of various kinds. None of these industries come in competition with other industries in that immediate vicinity except farming. It has been claimed here over and over again that we can not successfully conduct a business of that kind. The records of that State prison absolutely destroys any such contention as that. We have not only been successful in employing these men, but we have been successful in making a considerable amount of money for the State. There is no doubt about that. Anybody that will investigate will find that is true.

But that is not what I wanted to call to your attention principally. Here is what we do with these men. When they first go into that prison they may be sent to the farm. The labor there is not of an expert class. They are in no position to earn much when released if farm labor is the only thing they can perform. The farmer, as a rule, does not want the convict. He must usually seek employment in the cities, where he is an impersonal cog in a great machine. Consequently he drifts to the cities. There, if his capacity to earn is small, temptation to relapse into crime is great. In our prison, if he shows any disposition to be decent and has any aptitude to learn some trade, he is made to do so, to the end that he has some trade to enable him to easily make a living after he has been released.

And we do another thing—and I take pride in the fact that I originally suggested section 4 of this bill—we pay that man as long as he is in that prison if he behaves himself, and as he improves in skill his pay is increased. When the prisoner leaves the prison walls he has not only money with which to take care of himself, but he has a trade. And it is true that we have been able to build up a great many of those people—make them good and useful citizens. Very few of them go back to a life of crime and degradation, while under the system that some of you gentlemen have been advocating, you are almost forcing them to again become criminals. It is a disgrace to this country that our Federal prisons have no adequate means of caring for its inmates. I am not sure whether it is parsimony or politics that has left our prisons in their present deplorable condition. I am inclined to think it is the latter. It is time we do something.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 2, line 9, after the word "determine," insert "at a total cost of not to exceed $200,000."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, there is no testimony of the report of the commission——

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the committee has any objection to that amendment. I am inclined to accept the amendment.

Mr. GARD. The bill carries no appropriation for the purchase of a plant now. It is for later consideration by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman, who is a very good lawyer—one of the House's best lawyers, in my opinion, if he will permit me to say it—will notice that this amendment grants authority to the Attorney General to enter into contracts for the purchase of land. I wish to ask him whether there is any limit in this bill whatsoever on the authorization that he may go to in the purchase of land to bind the Government without any direct appropriation from Congress? I am asking that of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. There is no limitation that I see in the bill, I am frank to say to the gentleman. The limitation would be the necessary limitation of the lack of appropriation, because if there is no money to buy the property with, you could not make the purchase.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under this general language, as you will notice, you vest the Attorney General with the authority to purchase land to any extent, and then after entering into a contract the Committee on Appropriations would necessarily be obliged to recommend the appropriation of the money because it would be a binding obligation of the Government under an authorization by Congress.

Mr. WEBB. I was impressed with the objection of the gentleman from Illinois, and so far as I know the committee has no objection to putting a limit on it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Apart from the amendment, I wish to inquire what the word "such," in line 9 of page 2, refers to? You are granting to the Attorney General authority to purchase such tracts of land.

Mr. WEBB. Any tracts that might be proper.

Mr. STAFFORD. It does not say in language in the paragraph "any such tracts as he may decide to condemn," but it refers to something in the air, something which can not be located.

Mr. GARD. The word "such" can be eliminated without damage. It will have the same meaning that it now has.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, is it in order now to strike out all after line 3, on page 1, and offer a substitute for this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe I had the floor for the purpose of offering an amendment and speaking to it. Has any action been taken on that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is pending now. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was the Chairman about to state the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair put the question on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And not the main question?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that before we fix the amount, which is very large, we ought to have some information from the committee, if any is available, as to the acreage to be bought. Is there any testimony before the committee as to the amount of the land to be purchased? We may be fixing this amount very much higher than is necessary. We all know that placing money in the hands of some officials is an invitation to them to expend it. Two hundred thousand dollars to buy farm land will buy a very large tract in Georgia, I believe, where farm land is not very high in price. It seems to me we should have some information from the committee. It can not be that they put this in without any consideration whatever. They must have put it in at the suggestion of those who will have the execution of the law on their statement that it will be necessary to buy land. What land? How much? What will it cost? What is the committee able to tell us about the amount of money needed? We are in the dark when we are voting $200,000. It may be far too much or it may not be enough. I should like to have some information before I vote.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was about to state, immediately after the amendment was reported, that there was nothing in the report of the commission or in the hearings from which anyone could get an idea of the amount of land that would be necessary or the price of land in the territory tributary to the Atlanta prison.

I did not wish to fix too small an amount, so that sufficient land could not be acquired in which to keep occupied these thousand prisoners who will not be engaged in the mill. I estimated that the land might be purchased at $50 an acre down there, and some 4,000 acres or more might be acquired at that rate. I have no information that could be obtained from the hearings or the report of the commission by which I would be guided, and I was about to proceed on those lines when the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] said he was willing to accept the amendment. I am in the dark so far as the amount that the amendment carries.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that when the sum of $200,000 is suggested, it is suggested because we have got into the habit of dealing with large figures. Under ordinary circumstances we would not think of suggesting $200,000 for this purpose, we would not think of fixing any price without definite limitation. I am not favorably disposed toward this bill anyway. I think it proposes an improper or unnecessary use of a million dollars, and if we can cut it down in any way properly we ought to do it. Certainly we ought not to vote in the dark and spend $200,000, or invite an officer of the Government to spend $200,000, if it is not absolutely necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman believe that there should be some limitation on the amount which he might spend, rather than the blanket authority as carried in the committee amendment, without any limitation at all, even though that amount may be too large?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I think there ought to be a limitation. But I would like to know what I am doing when I am fixing the limitation. Two hundred thousand dollars is not a limitation at all; it is, I believe, very much too high.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania offers the following amendment: Page 2, line 9, after the word "points," insert the words "in the vicinity of the Atlanta Penitentiary."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered for the purpose of limiting the power of the Attorney General in the purchase or condemnation of land to the vicinity of the Atlanta Penitentiary.

Mr. WEBB. Will my friend yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman can use some word which will localize it in place of the word "vicinity," I shall be glad to have it done.

Mr. STAFFORD. "Vicinage" might be a good word.

Mr. WEBB. That would be a little dangerous, because we made an investigation and found that the land immediately around the Atlanta Penitentiary is held at so high a price that nobody ought to buy it for farming purposes. It is right in the edge of the city of Atlanta, as the gentleman knows, if he is familiar with the geography of the place.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; the gentleman's information is more up to date than mine on that subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEBB. It is in the suburbs of the city of Atlanta; and if they are required to buy the land immediately around the penitentiary, it will cost too much money for farming purposes. Therefore we gave them this leeway. We thought that out 4 or 5 or 10 miles they could buy land suitable for the purpose.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am perfectly willing to limit it to a radius of 10 miles from the penitentiary.

Mr. WEBB. I will accept that, as far as I am concerned. That was the object of the committee.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. How much land are you going to buy?

Mr. WEBB. I do not know, and nobody else knows.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by inserting after the word "points" the words "within a radius of 10 miles of the Atlanta Penitentiary."

Mr. WEBB. I think that is acceptable to the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Or I would limit it to 15 miles.

Mr. WEBB. I think 15 miles will be better.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to modify it so as to make it "within a radius of 15 miles of the Atlanta Penitentiary."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The purpose of the amendment to the amendment is plain. As the amendment reads, it gives the Attorney General the power to purchase or condemn land anywhere in the United States and not necessarily for the purposes of the Atlanta Penitentiary. I am opposed to the whole proposition; but if we are going to locate an industrial establishment at the Atlanta Penitentiary and then give the Attorney General power to condemn land or to purchase land in the furtherance of that purpose, he ought to be limited in the exercise of his power to a radius of 15 miles at most from the Atlanta Penitentiary. I do not think he ought to have power to buy land in Texas or to buy land in Florida or to buy land in Pennsylvania with which to serve the purposes of the Atlanta Penitentiary.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I think that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] would be an unwise amendment to adopt, because there is absolutely no testimony before the committee as to the nature of the land around Atlanta. I take it that if the Federal Government spends the amount of money authorized in this bill for land on which to work its convicts it will want to buy productive land. In other words, that it will want to make the best bargain that it can. Our penitentiary system in the State of Texas several years ago abandoned the lease system. We no longer work our convicts under the lease system, but the most of them are worked on farms owned by the State in places where we think the productive area of the soil is the best. For instance, we have one large State farm on Red River up in northeast Texas. We have another State farm on the Brazos River; and I think still another one in another part of the State. If we tie the hands of the Attorney General as to where he may spend this money and say that he shall purchase the land within 15 miles radius of Atlanta, what evidence have we that productive soil can be purchased? If we operate a Federal convict farm, it would not necessarily follow that the prisoners who work on it would have to be brought in to the Atlanta Federal Penitentiary each night from their work and lodged there. That is not generally the way these prison farms are operated. The usual way is to build quarters for the men on the farms, and during the farming season they live out there on these farms, where they are convenient to the land. The location need not necessarily be close to the penitentiary at all. We ought not to tie the hands of the Attorney General and say, "You shall buy land within 10 or 15 miles of Atlanta, or even within 20 miles of Atlanta." We ought to permit him to have the discretion and the power to investigate the situation and spend the money where the best soil can be bought, that will yield the best returns. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment offered by the committee.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to present my amendment to strike out all after line 3, page 1, and insert the following——

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I have an amendment to page 1. Does that come before the committee amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is first on the committee amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 37, noes 17.

Accordingly the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENCH: Page 2, line 6, after the word "shop," strike out the period and insert a comma and the words "and the articles so manufactured shall be sold only to the Government of the United States."

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I think it is the purpose of the committee in reporting this bill to provide that what I have indicated in the amendment shall be the condition. However, I think the language is rather ambiguous; and, in fact, I was talking with one Member of the House who is in favor of the bill, who believes that my amendment ought not to be adopted, because he thinks there ought to be the option of selling the articles manufactured to others than the United States if there is an opportunity. For my part I would oppose that, and it is for that reason I offer this amendment. Perhaps I should say that I am in favor of the measure. I am in favor of it, first of all, because those who have had the hearings on the question and have gone into it urge it as a war proposition. I am in favor of it, most of all, from the standpoint of humanity and that which we ought to afford the inmates of a great penal institution. The time has passed when men who graduate from the penitentiaries throughout the country should graduate to be more proficient in crime. Rather, they should be graduated so that they will be useful citizens, and the percentage should be less and less every year of those who would go back to a criminal career. It is true to-day as it was when first said, "The idle man's brain is the devil's workshop." It is absolutely true, and we ought to provide some way by which the men who must be kept in penal institutions for a time shall be kept busy, and that when we turn them forth they will be fitted for a useful occupation.

The question of prison labor competing with free labor is an important one. I am opposed to letting criminals engage in work which directly competes with labor. On the other hand, in a large sense there is nothing the inmates of a penitentiary can do that does not compete with labor in some degree. Yet most of us approve of prison labor when prisoners are engaged in working upon the roads, when they are engaged in working upon the highways, when they are engaged, as they have been for years in my State, in building the walls of the penitentiary in which they are inclosed, and in many kinds of labor I could mention. But even so, the building of the walls of a penitentiary is to engage in competition with the labor of the stonemason and of the quarryman, and the growing of vegetables for the prison table is to compete with the market gardener. Yet this is legitimate. It is labor for the State, for society. But if we go beyond that and say that they may even place the products on the market you immediately place the labor of the convict in competition with the market gardener and the farmer. So then I would oppose the engagement of inmates of penitentiaries in the construction of buildings to be used as offices and residences over the State, although I would favor prison labor in getting stone from the quarry and putting up buildings that would be for the prison's own use.

There is a line that we can draw between the kinds of labor in which men may engage. All labor to some degree is in competition with other labor. There is a kind of labor which we are glad to welcome because it adds to the world's wealth.

I believe another thing. It is a fortunate time to establish this plant for another reason. Now is the time when the world wants labor, the United States wants labor. In all the papers there is evidence of the great demand for labor. If normally this labor would impinge on private business, now is the time most of all when it will not or scarcely at all. There will be other markets and other demands for those in private lines capable of producing things that the inmates of the penitentiary can produce. For these reasons I am in favor of not only the amendment but the bill itself. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. Matter is useful to the human animal only after labor has been bestowed upon it. There is much talk about competition, much talk about not interfering with labor, and that it does not interfere much. Now, in the main agriculture employs one-third of the American people. It is not unionized. I think it is said that the nonpartisan people up in North Dakota and perhaps getting over into Minnesota are unionized, but substantially farm labor is not unionized, and therefore we will have prison farms and authorize the purchase of land as it does in the bill. To do what? To raise cotton, to raise corn, to raise vegetables, and so on. Oh, well, they will not kick, they are not unionized, and it will not affect our votes. That is the way to do it. Somebody else says put them on the roads. Good heavens, roads are made to travel upon, and certain seasons of the year they require repair; in fact you have to do work on a road before it is of much account either in dry or wet weather. Well, put the convicts on the road; that gives them plenty of fresh air, as it does on the farm or in the vegetable garden. That would compete a little more with people who work for day wages or for monthly wages, so that we might be a little more embarrassed than if they were put on the farm. And so it goes.

Now, this amendment is to the effect that the products of this institution are to be sold to the United States only. The United States buys a good many things. It buys furniture. It does not buy vegetables to any great extent, but it buys all kinds of textiles, hardware, and a great many things, so that wherever you get an article that is manufactured by these convicts it comes into competition. These convicts, oh, how sorry we are for them. My God, we are so sorry for them, but we are taking pains to see that they do not compete with anybody that is engaged in labor that is unionized and has got a vote. [Laughter and applause.] So let us not fool ourselves. It may be that we can fool our constituents. The truth is that in this time of war I hate to see this million dollars spent. I think I shall vote against this bill, because when you come to expend it who pays the taxes that raises the money? Union labor, labor of unionized men on the railways, men doing all kinds of things, they have to contribute this million dollars, to do what?

Why, to support these people that will compete in their products with the product of these others. Say—let us wait now a little bit; as we are going to double expenditures for the coming fiscal year, according to the newspapers, as we are going to double taxes for the coming year, and are going to put a million and a half or two million men additional to the soldiers we already have in France, with our great pension roll, with our great insurance roll, with the great amount that it takes to support our soldiers and the amount that it takes to support their dependents at home—let us wait until the war closes before we spend this million.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill at this time, because we need the money, which I would sooner see expended for bullets under present conditions. The principle of this bill was first introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] in the Fifty-seventh Congress. It has come up repeatedly since that time, until they think now they have a good prospect for its passage on the ground of its necessity as a war measure. Anyone who heard those letters read this afternoon about the making of duck by men who can not get an order out of the Government with an ox team will be satisfied that there is opportunity for making duck, that there is now plenty of help and plenty of machinery to manufacture duck by private firms, provided the Government wants it and can cut out this principle of prison labor. The Government can not get the machinery inside of a year, anyway. I have a letter here from the warden of one of the largest prisons in the United States, and he says that it is apparent to anyone who has given the matter a thought that it would be impossible to equip a prison for munition work; that machinery for that purpose is not to be had; that plants producing machinery are years behind with their orders. Mr. Chairman, this is simply an opening wedge to get legislation for the working of prison convicts.

I want to say just a word about these dear prisoners. I have been on both sides in the trial of capital offenses. Every time a man is convicted the court takes him in his office and inquires about his character, habits, and antecedents. I have stood beside the widowed mother dressed in mourning. I have seen good people carrying flowers into jail and give them to the prisoner that put that mother in mourning. I have seen the man fêted and covered with sympathy in jail who knocked out the brains of a peaceful slumberer to get his money. I want to tell you something about the humanity part of it. Our good colleague, Dr. FESS, of Ohio, wishes criminals to be prepared for future life. Anybody who wants to look up the career of 43 prisoners, every one of whom escaped from the State prison in Michigan or broke his parole in the year 1917, can do so. I have here the list and the amount of the reward that is offered for the return of every one of them. Perhaps some of us could make more money at that occupation than we do now. Those in favor of this bill want these prisoners to make duck. My friends, I am not currying any friendship or favor from these men who have committed these deeds in the dead hour of night. I am for establishing justice. Prisoners are put in prison for the purpose of punishment, and are reformed incidentally. All of us want to see men do well.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Can the gentleman state whether this new idea of prison reform prevails in Michigan?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; they work them in the gardens and let them have their liberty and eventually——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman know whether there is any prison reform sentiment in Michigan such as this Atlanta Penitentiary proposition?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There may be a few humanitarians that have big, soft hearts like some of our colleagues.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's State is one of the most advanced in prison reform of all the States of the Union.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the prisoners are the most advanced of any in the Union. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. That is a document to prove the nature of their treatment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes. And they give from $25 to $100 reward for the return of each one of them. Here is a picture of each one of them—they are all good looking.

Mr. HICKS. Does not the gentleman think if all those men escape, the authorities of Michigan should be investigated?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no; we have fine men in Michigan. And our prison wardens are among the most prominent men in the State.

Mr. FESS. Those men do not represent all of the prisoners they have in that State?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; this is just from one prison. One evening I went over to make a speech in a city in my home county when I was trying to get the nomination the first time for this great office that I am now honored with. A few of my friends came from around the county to hear me; on account of friendship for me I always thought, because I do not think that I could either entertain or instruct them. While we were standing in the hotel office we heard a loud applause outside where I was to speak on the street at half-past 7——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given more time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Some one went out to find out if the crowd was getting impatient and what caused the handclapping, and reported that there was a speaker out there on a soap box who stated that he was in favor of demolishing every State prison in the United States, and they were applauding that ridiculous statement to make fun of him.

Now, I will tell you something more. We must have some law. I am in favor of law; I am in favor of order; I am in favor of a more perfect Union, to establish justice, to insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity and your posterity. I am willing to dedicate my life to those principles and my fortune and my sacred honor as truly as our forefathers did. I tell you, my colleagues, that to-day, just as our colleague from Massachusetts has said, it is no time to bring up this legislation. In the Fifty-seventh Congress it was brought up by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], and a bill has continued to be before us ever since upon the calendar or in the committee, and a bill for prison labor is now fathered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER], and I want to tell you what he says:

I can not imagine of anybody wanting the convict labor of this country, the labor of men inside the penitentiaries and reformatories coming in contact with the labor of free men who are on the outside, who are honest, upright, and industrious working men, who have families to support.

He further said, on page 3 of the hearings before the Labor Committee, January 20, 1916, on this question:

Mr. VAN DYKE. May I ask you a question there, Judge? What would you do in States where it would be impossible to build roads in the winter?

Mr. BOOHER. Well, let the convicts do as the men outside do in the wintertime. The great mass of the laboring people of this country that are not in manufacturing institutions can not labor in the wintertime; they can not go out in the field and work; they can not go out and pursue the usual avenues of industry; but there is always something that they can find for the convicts to do in the penitentiary. But suppose they can not. Now, just take the other side of the question. Suppose they can not be occupied in the wintertime, all of them. Is it not better for those men to be unemployed in the wintertime and employed in the summer time than to drive out of employment and out of existence the laboring man outside and the small manufacturing institution? That is my position on this matter.

Some gentleman stated that prisoners objected to working on the roads because it humiliated them so as to make it painful. That they were ashamed to be seen going and coming to and from their work in the prison gang.

Why, just think of that! Think of the prisoner who has murdered your wife or child being humiliated because he has to work on the road, feeling ashamed of his employment, and you have such regard for his feelings you do not want to hurt them. At the present time, if we want to employ prison labor, let us put them in the mines digging coal, so that the mother and the babe will not have to go to bed next winter to keep life in their bodies. That would not compete with free labor any more than making duck. Besides we have plenty of duck makers, while the supply of coal is short. Let us put them on the road, and what is the use of being touchy about their feelings? If it came home to you and they had committed this crime against you or a member of your family, you would not stand for this humanity and sentimentality a second. Humanitarianism works all right if you are not touched by it, but I say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] that if a base criminal entered your house at night and murdered your wife or daughter, you would not want him to get imprisonment only. That is all right. [Applause.] Criminology may be all right when it comes to the proper time for considering it as an economic question. We have got the factories now for the manufacture of this duck. They have offered to manufacture it for the Government. The offer has been presented here on the floor of the House. Now, the machinery for equipping this prison can not be gotten for two years, but in the meantime we should support our soldiers and spend our money for our Army and Navy. They can not fight if they think we are not doing our part. The morale of our people here must be equal to the morale of the men behind the guns. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill not so much because I regard it as a war measure but because I favor the proposition on its merits, and I would vote for it as readily in peace times as I would under present conditions. The very logic of the argument of the gentleman from Michigan proves that his own position is illogical. He says, "Put these men to work in the coal mines; put them to work on the farm." Well, gentlemen, do not we know that you can not use all of this prison labor in any one avocation? It would not be proper or feasible to work all of them on a farm or all in a coal mine or in any one particular line of industry, and the argument of the gentleman from Michigan supports the proposition that they ought to be worked somewhere, and, to my way of thinking, one of the proper activities would be a cotton-duck manufacturing enterprise such as we propose to establish under authority of this bill. Now, several different kinds of arguments have been offered against this measure. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] submits a considerable file of correspondence here for the purpose of showing that certain manufacturing establishments in Massachusetts could not secure a contract with the Quartermaster Department to sell the Government a certain amount of cotton duck. Well, I am not able to see what that has to do with the proposition under consideration. Nothing whatever. There has been no argument here, even by those in opposition, that the passage of this bill will put any cotton factory out of business. There is no argument here that it will close up a single spindle——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask my colleague, or rather suggest in reply to his question of what this has to do with it, that the manufacturer in Massachusetts, whose name I have forgotten——

Mr. BLACK. Whittall.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Did offer the Quartermaster Corps an opportunity to secure duck with reasonable dispatch; that he pleaded on the 18th of April for an answer to letters written in January offering to do it. Now, the excuse for this bill is that we want to get duck to meet the necessities of the Government in connection with the Army, and if this is true why not get it the quickest way?

Mr. BLACK. That is not my excuse for advocating this bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Two excuses.

Mr. BLACK. That is not my reason. The facts brought out in the hearing show there are about 700 men in the Atlanta Penitentiary who are unemployed; and my reason for supporting this measure is that they ought to be given wholesome and useful employment. It is bad for them that they should be idle, and it is unjust to tax the people to support them in idleness.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is the gentleman in favor of an eight-hour day for prison employees in the Federal workshops in prisons?

Mr. BLACK. Perhaps the hours of labor would best be determined by the nature of the employment. I will say to the gentleman from Washington, however, that I think the hours of labor ought to be reasonable and humane.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The report intimates that about half the rate of union-labor hours will be required of prison laborers.

Mr. BLACK. I do not know what hours of labor are contemplated to be used in this prison factory. It is not specified in the bill; but I think they ought to be reasonable and humane, giving to the prisoners time for healthy recreation. Now, I listened to the argument of the two gentlemen from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER and Mr. DOMINICK], who said we ought not to put convicts to work in this cotton-duck factory, because it would tend to increase tuberculosis. In support of their contention, they cite the experience of South Carolina; and what are the facts in the case? The facts in the case, as I understand them, are that the convicts of South Carolina were worked in a factory owned by a private concern, and the prisoners were worked under a leasing system.

And I submit that there is a great deal of difference between working convicts under the leasing system and in working them in a factory owned and operated by the Federal Government, surrounded by the sanitary and healthy conditions which I am sure will be rigidly maintained.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I understand the gentleman is not in favor of private enterprise exploiting prison labor?

Mr. BLACK. I certainly am not.

Mr. FESS. But in the Government working them for the benefit of the laborer?

Mr. BLACK. Exactly.

Mr. FESS. The prisoner himself?

Mr. BLACK. Exactly; and with this further statement that the system should be made self-sustaining as nearly as possible. In the State of Texas we formerly had the leasing system, and the convicts were leased to large plantation owners, and a great deal of complaint followed this leasing system. It was alleged that they were sometimes worked in the rain, that they were worked in the cold, and that very often, from unnecessary and inhumane exposure, they contracted pneumonia and tuberculosis and other diseases. I think some of these facts were established by investigations which were made.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for three minutes more in order to complete this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLACK. And we abandoned the leasing system. But because those men contracted tuberculosis and pneumonia and diseases of that kind under the leasing system was no evidence that farming was a dangerous or hazardous occupation and that prisoners should not be worked on the farm. It was simply proof of the impropriety of the leasing system. So we have done the proper and logical thing and have purchased State farms.

These farms are owned by the State of Texas and are operated by the State officials with prison labor, and we have done away with the evils of the leasing system. And, therefore, I say that it is in entire harmony with justice and reason and common sense to build these factories, to purchase these farms, and to train these men in useful avocations, and not only to train them, but to get the benefit of their labor while they are incarcerated.

Now, it is immaterial to me as to who favors the bill or who does not favor it. I am glad that union labor indorses it, but that absolutely has no bearing on my advocacy of the measure. I would be for it just the same, even if union labor was solidly opposed to it. I have never agreed with union labor's position to the effect that convict-labor work by the Government would compete with free labor to any considerable extent, because it is inconceivable to me that any State or the Federal Government will ever have enough convicts in its prisons to seriously compete with free labor. I do not think there is any merit in that contention. And I think we ought to pass this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending, offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I wish the protagonists of this bill would not leave us in doubt as to what argument should persuade us to support it. My colleague from Texas [Mr. BLACK] says that he is for the bill not because it is primarily intended to provide duck that they need in the Quartermaster Corps to supply deficiencies in the Army but because he is sorry for the convicts. He wants them provided with congenial and profitable employment under sanitary conditions.

Mr. BLACK. I think the gentleman misunderstood my position, or does not state it fully. My reason is that for the benefit of the convicts and for the people we ought to work them in useful employment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, any convict ought to be kept in idleness. It is a cruel punishment that I do not believe in, but there are lines of work in which they may be employed that will compete less with the people who are engaged in industrial enterprises than in the manufacture of textile fabrics, and I would like to see them so employed—on the highways, for example. But, Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the bill, as I understood the distinguished gentleman who is the chairman of the committee, is to provide speedily to the Government its requirements in the way of heavy cotton duck for tarpaulins, wagon covers, mail sacks, and things of that kind.

What amazed me in that connection was that there should have been a tender from a manufacturer in the city of Worcester, a man of large capital and large experience, of cloth to be supplied within a few weeks and in increased quantities and that he should have addressed the communication to the Quartermaster Corps in January and have had no reply to his suggestion in April.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I have not time. My time is about out.

Mr. Chairman, if the desire of the proponents of this measure is to get the cotton duck, which I understand we need now, then the thing to do is to close with the offer of a practical manufacturer, and do it promptly, because under the most hopeful conditions possible, if we are yet to buy machinery that is only promised to be delivered in six months—and it will not be, in my judgment—and install it and begin the manufacture of goods, it is safe to say that a year will have elapsed before any will be delivered, and our Army and Navy will have gone without the use of this duck which they say is so essential to their comfort and to the proper prosecution of the war. Therefore, there being two reasons advanced, one of which can not be honestly made, or else these offers would have been closed with, and the other sentimental, I can not see how I can possibly support the measure.

Mr. HUSTED and Mr. BANKHEAD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed on this amendment. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that it be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be again read.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 2.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that there is an amendment pending at the desk. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania: Page 1, line 6, after the word "factories," strike out "for the manufacture of cotton fabrics."

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, upon answering an inquiry propounded by me, stated that the sole object of this bill was to manufacture cotton duck. Now, if those words remain in the bill which I have asked to be stricken out, it seems clear that the penitentiaries will have the privilege of manufacturing all cotton fabrics, because the bill clearly states that the Attorney General is authorized and directed to establish, equip, maintain, and operate a factory or factories for the manufacture of cotton fabrics.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Just a moment. "For the manufacture of cotton fabrics to supply the requirements of the War and Navy Departments, the Shipping Corporation, cotton duck suitable for tents and other Army purposes." Now, it is possible, if these words remain, that all the Federal prisons can be used to manufacture cotton products required in the Army, Navy, and in the Post Office Departments.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the purpose of the gentleman's amendment, it is to strike out the limitation as carried in the bill restricting these factories in the manufacture of cotton fabrics, and allows them to manufacture anything they see fit which are supplies for the requirements for the War and Navy Departments.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. It is just the opposite.

Mr. STAFFORD. The effect of the gentleman's amendment will be to strike out the limitation and allow them to manufacture all sorts of supplies. If the gentleman will read it, he will come to that conclusion himself.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. It reads "cotton duck."

Mr. STAFFORD. No. If the gentleman's amendment is adopted there is authorization for the establishment of a factory or factories—to supply what? "Cotton fabrics to supply the requirements of the War and Navy Departments" and the requirements of the Shipping Corporation. What next? "Cotton duck suitable for tents and other Army purposes, and canvas for mail sacks, and for the manufacture of mail sacks and other similar mail-carrying equipment for the use of the United States Government." You have broadened that rather than limited it.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. I differ with the gentleman. The language in the bill permits the Government to manufacture all kinds of cotton fabrics.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman admit that the words he strikes out are a limitation?

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. No. They broaden it.

Mr. FESS. It seems to me they confine it.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. The bill reads "a factory or factories for the manufacture of cotton fabrics to supply the requirements of the War and Navy Departments, the Shipping Corporation," and so forth.

Mr. FESS. It seems to me that here is a limitation that defines the power. If you strike it out, then they can manufacture anything.

Mr. WATSON of Pennsylvania. Suppose the language I move to strike out remains in—"for the manufacture of cotton fabrics to supply the requirements of the War and Navy Departments." Does not that mean cotton fabrics? And to supply the Shipping Corporation, and the other objects, supplying everything necessary for the Post Office Department. It is broader than I would have it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I am at a considerable loss to know whether this is a war measure or a bill inaugurating prison reform at the Federal prison at Atlanta, Ga. The President stated to us when the bill was pending in the Committee on Rules that it was essentially a war measure. The impression was made on the Rules Committee that the Government must have heavy ducking and there was no other way of getting it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the President stated that to the committee?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The President wrote a letter to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have not really the time to yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Was that letter on this bill?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The letter was on this bill, yes; certainly. I suppose it can be produced. Probably some member of the committee has it at hand.

Mr. WEBB. I can use the language. It is addressed to Mr. Pou. He says, "I regard it of genuine pressing public importance."

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And as a war measure? Does he not state that it is a war measure?

Mr. WEBB. Not in that letter.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Well, we may have another one before night. [Laughter.]

Now, my sympathies for the inmates of the Federal penitentiaries are not exercised at this time. The inmates are there because they have committed crimes against the laws of the United States. They should, however, be employed in some way so that they could be earning something and usefully occupying their time. But there is another lot of fellows down in Georgia who ought to be employed. They are alien enemies, and every one of them ought to be made to produce something upon which he could live; either that or starve. [Applause.] If I had my way about it I would take every alien enemy under the control of the United States to-day and put him out in the semiarid country, where there is irrigation, and I would simply say, "You root, hog, or die, right here." [Applause.] I would not feed or keep him in luxury and in ease, with bands of music, with reception committees, and speakers to deliver eulogies upon the cause of the central powers when new alien enemies are brought in to the detention camps. I would separate them and keep them at work away out in the mountain country, where they could not do any harm as spies, or in any other way aid the enemy of the United States.

Now, I do not know whether to support this bill because it is of pressing necessity or as a war measure. That has been denied. It has been stated here that we can get all the ducking we need, that contractors are offering it to the Government, and that the Government is refusing to close contracts. This is no time to start out on a philanthropic crusade to reform prisoners.

Mr. BAER. Or on a duck hunt. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; or anything of that sort. We are engaged in a most serious business at this time; and I, as a member of the Committee on Rules, would never have voted to bring this bill on the floor of the House if it had not been impressed upon me from the language of the President's letter that this was a matter that was pressing on the country at this time and should have the attention of Congress now, because it was a war measure. Prison-reform measures have been slumbering in committee for years and years. This is no time to take the attention of the country and of Congress to embark upon the enterprise of prison reform.

If prison labor is needed in the production of necessary war material, I am in favor of employing it. Upon the other hand, if it is merely to give wholesome, healthful employment to men who have violated the laws of their country, I would let them wait until after the war is over; but I would immediately give wholesome employment to every alien enemy that we have in the United States and require them to earn their living, and that is the kind of bill we should be considering at this time, rather than this one.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment has been exhausted.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOOD. Has the committee amendment, beginning in line 7, page 2, been voted upon?

The CHAIRMAN. It has. That language has been inserted by the amendment which has been adopted.

Mr. GOOD. I move to strike out the last word. I had intended—rather reluctantly—to vote for this bill. If it is necessary to employ the convicts in this penitentiary to produce this cotton cloth I am willing to vote for the proposition; but I want to call the attention of the committee to one thing. Section 4 authorizes an appropriation to the extent of $650.000 for the purchase of machinery and other equipment to carry out the purposes of this act. Section 5 provides for an authorization of $350.000 for working capital; but the provision which has been voted in takes the lid off, and there is no limit to which the Attorney General can not go in the purchase of land to carry on agricultural pursuits.

Mr. WEBB. By a committee amendment the amount has been limited to $200,000.

Mr. GOOD. I did not understand from the answer of the chairman that a limit had been placed upon it. That was the reason for my inquiry. I am glad, indeed, to learn that some limit has been placed on that authorization. It seemed to me very strange that there was absolutely no limit in the bill as reported which the Attorney General could expend in the purchase of land. I think the amount of $200.000 is altogether too much, and, to my mind, it will be wasted, because anybody who knows anything about farming knows that you can not take prisoners from the penitentiary and carry them in a conveyance 10 miles to a farm and operate that farm successfully from a financial standpoint. That can not be done. For every dollar those men will produce on the farm it will cost the Government $5 in getting the work done. It is a piece of the biggest folly I ever heard of, and I have yet to hear a good, reasonable, sound argument for placing that provision in the bill, which is calculated for another purpose altogether.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The gentleman expressed some satisfaction that the amendment limiting the amount of the expenditure for land to $200.000 had been adopted. I presume the gentleman's approval will be somewhat qualified when he knows that the committee, in answer to inquiries, told us that they do not know how much land is needed; that they do not know where available land is located; and that they do not know the price of land down there. They do not know anything about the value of it or how much it will be necessary to pay for what they want.

Mr. GOOD. I think it would be good economy if the Attorney General should purchase land at $5.000 or $10,000 an acre, because then he would not purchase much, and the after expense would be comparatively small. If he purchases a large tract and attempts to farm it, we are engaging upon an enterprise that means a waste of hundreds of thousands of dollars, and I do not know why we are doing it.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Why would not the gentleman's criticism apply to the cotton manufactory in the prison just the same?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know as much about the manufacture of cotton as I do about agricultural pursuits. I think I know something about agriculture. I have observed agriculture all my life, and I know you can not do the sort of thing proposed here.

Mr. WALSH. What information has the gentleman that the land will be 10 miles away?

Mr. GOOD. It was stated in the debate here that land near Atlanta could not be bought, but that they would have to go out some 6 to 10 miles to get it at a reasonable price.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "cotton," strike out the word "fabrics" and insert in lieu thereof the word "duck"; same page, line 8, after the word "corporation," strike out the words "cotton duck suitable for tents."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment is adopted it will carry out the purpose the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON] had in mind in offering an amendment a few moments ago. It will confine the manufacturing activity at the Atlanta Penitentiary to the manufacture of cotton-duck supplies for the War and Navy Departments, Shipping Corporation, and other Army purposes, and canvas for mail sacks for the Post Office Department, and so forth.

It has been stated here time and again to hasten the passage of this bill through the House, that the President has written a letter to favor of the bill, and that it has been approved by Samuel Gompers, the president of the American Federation of Labor. I am inclined at present, although some one may have a letter up his sleeve, to challenge that statement. I am inclined to believe the President's indorsement was of another bill, and had reference to the general scheme of prison reform to which reference has been made. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] reaches his hand in his pocket at this opportune moment, I observe, and produces a letter.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; I will yield if the letter comes from the President.

Mr. WEBB. I have a letter addressed to Mr. POU, chairman of the Rules Committee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman send it to the Clerk's desk to be read?

Mr. BUTLER. Is the letter to Congress or to some Member of Congress?

Mr. WEBB. It is a letter written to the chairman of the Rules Committee when the rule was under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D. C., 27 April, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. POU: As you know, I am as much interested as the Attorney General is in House bill 8938, providing for a cotton factory at the Atlanta Penitentiary. Indeed, I regard the measure as of genuine and pressing public importance. I trust, therefore, that you will think me justified, in view of this conviction on my part, in asking if in your opinion it will be possible to put this bill on the preferred calendar following the bills which the Committee on Rules has already listed for preferred action? I am sure you will believe that I would not ask this if it were not a matter of real concern to me.

Cordially and sincerely, yours,

WOODROW WILSON.

HON. EDWARD W. POU,
House of Representatives.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would be the last man on this side of the House to suggest that a bill to encourage prison labor at the Atlanta Penitentiary as against free labor outside would emanate from any political party. I do not think it possible that any wide-awake Democrat could vote for a measure indorsing the suggestion that we should discourage the cotton mills of the South by putting in competition with them men who have been convicted of murder, possibly, or counterfeiting, larceny, or other crimes against the Federal Government. This letter of the President does not indorse any such suggestion, and yet it is advanced as a reason for the votes of Congress. You will observe that not one word in that letter refers to the "necessities of war." The President says he would like to have the bill pass. That's all.

What is it that brings the pressure upon this body of representatives of the people? The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] a short time ago, a little more earnestly than is usual for him, told us that the appropriation, which many of us had forgotten, for the construction of the buildings had been rushed through the House last year under a rule. That indicated a certain premeditation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will not say that this is a political move. It may not be, but we have been assured that it is a "war measure" in spite of the fact that manufacturing concerns outside of prison have offered to make all the cotton duck the Government needs. I am not convinced that these men in the Atlanta prison can be trained in time nor that the machinery with which to train them can be procured in time to be of any real service in the prosecution of this war.

What are the facts and what is at the bottom of this movement? The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] and a Senator whom I dare not name—not that I would not, but under the rules I can not—have jointly introduced bills looking to a universal prison-reform system in the United States, by which system for all time to come hereafter we are to put the men in jail, behind iron bars, in competition with those outside who have to labor for their daily wage.

Gentlemen who have been talking for labor in this House may well ponder over what they now propose to do. Does the President say this is a war measure? Read again that letter that the gentleman from North Carolina fished out of his pocket a moment ago. Does the President say this is a war measure? No. I do not so read that letter. He says the bill is important, and should be passed, but he does not say it is a war measure. This bill is not new; it has been on the calendar in one form or another ever since I came to Congress. It was here long before the war, long before Mr. Wilson became President. Evidently it has been seized upon here as the forerunner of industrial establishments within the walls of every penitentiary in the country—not for the period of the war, but for all time. Gentlemen say we must look to the humanitarian side of this question. I am willing to look on the humanitarian side of the question, and if I were inclined to be as emotional and sympathetic as some of my friends—and I hope I do not lack in sympathy for the unfortunate—I would look upon the poorly clad widow with her two children whom I saw yesterday knocking at the door of the War Department, with an unanswered inquiry for the husband who is gone, gone, I presume, in the service of his country. I can imagine that same widow and her children knocking at the door of a cotton-duck factory in North Carolina or in Massachusetts, and I can hear the watchman say, "This mill is closed to you," and when she asks, "Where may I go, even with my feeble hands, to obtain an honest day's work?" I am sure it would sadden my friend from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] or my good friend from Ohio [Mr. FESS], as I know it would me, to hear the answer, "You can go to the Atlanta Penitentiary; they have moved the cotton-duck factory to that point." God forbid that such a condition may ever arise to plague the man who votes for this bill.

Prison reformers for this bill? I asked the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] a little while ago if his State was in sympathy with this measure. I asked him that because I had before me a message from the warden of the Michigan State penitentiary opposing this whole prison-reform program as "a camouflage." If I have time, though I may not indorse the argument of the writer, I shall have it read. It shows that while there is a tendency to throw bouquets at some of our convicts at this particular time the managers of our penal institutions are not unanimous upon the reformation measures proposed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that this letter may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

MICHIGAN STATE PRISON,
OFFICE OF THE WARDEN,
JACKSON.

One of the cleverest camouflages brought about by the war is contained in Senate bill 3076 * * * and House bill No. 9683, introduced by Representative BOOHER. These bills, professing to offer aid and assistance to those who are trying to build up a legitimate prison industry to take the place of the old contract-labor system, are in reality intended as the last nail in the coffin of all reformatory and penitentiary activity——

Mr. KEATING (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. The letter has reference to another bill, but the point of order I desire to make is in its reference to a Member of another body.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask that that be stricken from the letter.

Mr. KEATING. I think the message is clearly out of order.

Mr. WEBB. How much time has the gentleman from Pennsylvania remaining.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But I obtained consent to have the letter read.

Mr. KEATING. I make the point of order that the language of the letter is out of order and of such a character that it can not be permitted to go into the RECORD.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. That referred merely to the reference to a Senator, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks to have that stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. That part of the letter will be stricken out.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the letter, as follows:

It behooves every friend of reform in the United States to write his Congressman to oppose this measure. The two bills have gained for themselves a considerable following by suggesting a new means of speeding up war-munitions production. It is provided that the Government shall enter into a contract with any Federal or State prison that so desires for the production of military supplies. The price to be paid shall be as nearly as possible the price prevailing on other contracts of the kind. So far these provisions sound well.

The trouble is, in the first place, that only two or three prisons have any equipment with which to produce supplies. Outside of a few small prison harness shops, there are no facilities and no men versed in that sort of production. Machinery would have to be ordered, manufactured, and installed, and a force then developed to use the machinery. This fact makes obvious the insincerity of the proposed law. It is apparent to anyone who has given the matter a thought that it would be impossible to equip the prisons for munitions work. Machinery for this purpose is not to be had. Plants producing it are years behind with their orders. Not a lathe or a bench or a sewing machine could any of the prisons get.

A close reading of the bills show that the real import of them is contained in the clause forbidding the shipment of prison-made goods into any State forbidding their manufacture. As the enemies of prison industry and prison reform have already outlawed prison work in 23 States and hope to add most of the rest to their list within a year or two, it is evident that this clause would put out of business every prison industry in the Union.

The Booher-Smith bill is nothing new. For six years the interests behind this measure have been trying to secure its enactment. In 1916 it was the Booher-Hughes bill and did not masquerade as a war-measure bill. The patriotic camouflage was an afterthought, but it makes the present bill trebly dangerous.

Very truly,

EDWARD FRENSDORF,
Acting Warden Michigan State Prison.
Making Money and Remaking Men.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, that letter is signed by Mr. Frendsdorf, whom the members of the Michigan delegation tell me is a good Democrat and a very warm friend of the President.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The letter just read refers to the so-called Booher bill and does not refer to the measure now before the House. The Booher bill was reported to this House by the Committee on Labor. It provides for the equipment of all the Federal penitentiaries for the purpose of manufacturing cotton goods, furniture, paper, and various other things. In addition to that, it makes prison-made goods subject to the laws of the various States to which they may be shipped, and that is the real reason why the gentleman who wrote the letter which you have just heard, and those who are cooperating with him, oppose the bill. Various States have enacted laws forbidding the sale of convict-made goods within their borders, and the Booher bill would make it impossible to ship convict-made goods into those States.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I do.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Was it under the provisions of the Booher bill that the authorization or appropriation was made some years ago providing for a cotton factory in Atlanta and a furniture factory at Leavenworth?

Mr. KEATING. No; the Booher bill has never been enacted.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I understand; but was it in keeping with the principles of what was formerly the Hughes-Booher bill?

Mr. KEATING. The old Hughes-Booher bill merely provided for placing convict-made goods under the jurisdiction of the States to which they might be shipped. I will give the particular provision, so Members may understand it:

SEC. 3. That all goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined wholly or in part by prison labor, except paroled prisoners or in any prison or reformatory, transported into any State or Territory of the United States, or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage, except those disposed of by sale to the Federal Government as above provided for, shall, upon arrival and delivery in such State or Territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such State or Territory to the same extent and in the same manner as though such goods, wares, and merchandise had been manufactured, produced, or mined in such State or Territory, and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced in the original packages or otherwise.

The protest that this gentleman enters in the letter just read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is against the principle that the people of a sovereign State may say that convict-made goods, whether made in the State or out of it, shall not be sold within that State.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Now, another question in reference to the bill now under consideration. As a humanitarian proposition, why was the Leavenworth Penitentiary furniture factory left out of the consideration in this bill? If it is a humanitarian proposition for Atlanta, why not for Leavenworth?

Mr. KEATING. In reply to the gentleman's inquiry permit me to call the attention of the committee to a curious situation which has arisen because of the fact that one of these bills, the bill introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the bill introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER], both dealing with the same subject, was referred to the Committee on Labor.

The bill by Mr. BOOHER, which is now on the calendar and which I think should be under consideration to-day, provides not only for the factory at Atlanta and for a factory at Leavenworth, but another at McNeill Island in Washington. The Booher bill came before the Committee on Labor with the indorsement of the national administration as a war measure. It was regarded as a war measure because behind the prison walls of this country are more than 100,000 able-bodied men. You can not send them into the Army, you can not send them into the various industries of the country, yet this great army of men—able to work and to render very important service—is being held in the prisons of this country, and the suggestion made by the Secretary of War, and indorsed by the President of the United States, was that an effort should be made to give those men employment which would assist in the prosecution of the war.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then why has the matter been localized at the Atlanta Penitentiary, where it is proposed to establish a duck factory and a cotton farm?

Mr. KEATING. Simply because——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KEATING. I ask for five minutes more; I may not use it all.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman will pardon me, I desire first to answer the gentleman from Kansas. The reason was that the gentleman from Kentucky succeeded in getting his bill before this House.

Now, I think the Booher bill is to be preferred to the Sherley bill. The Sherley bill is, at least, one step in the right direction, and therefore I shall support the Sherley bill; but if it were possible I would offer the Booher bill as a substitute for the Sherley bill, because I believe as a war measure—and as a peace measure, too—these 100,000 men in the various prisons of this country should be put to some beneficial labor.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. We have only three penitentiaries under the control of the Government of the United States. How many men are in those?

Mr. KEATING. I do not know the exact number, but the Booher bill authorized the War Department and the Navy Department and the various other departments of the Government to enter into contracts with the State authorities, providing the State authorities were agreeable, by which the prisoners in the State prisons might be employed.

Now, gentlemen, one word more. Certain gentlemen have pleaded for the defeat of this bill on the ground that it brought the convicts in competition with free labor. So far as free labor has had an opportunity to express itself, and that has been through its chosen representatives, the leaders of the great labor organizations of this country, free labor favors this bill; and free labor is not a recent convert to the proposition.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Free labor, as represented by its organizations, has advocated for a great many years the employment of convicts upon the farms, the roads, or in the manufacture of goods for State use. This bill and the Booher bill both recognize that principle and provide that the things manufactured shall be for the exclusive use of the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is a spokesman for labor——

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman does me too much honor. I represent a congressional district in the State of Colorado.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Because the gentleman speaks well and ably whenever he speaks for labor; but does the gentleman with his knowledge of labor conditions say that free labor is in favor of interstate commerce in convict-made goods?

Mr. KEATING. No. I am trying to make clear the attitude of free labor. The principle is easily understood. It is that convicts shall be placed at some useful employment; on roads, if you will, on farms, if you will—and right there permit me to say that the gentleman who said that convicts can not be used to advantage on farms is not familiar with the experience of some of the States, notably my own State—or in various manufacturing activities. Always having in mind not only the return to the State, but the benefit to the convict himself.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes. But one point on which labor lays emphasis is that the product shall be sold to the State, county, municipality, or to the Federal Government. This is what is known as the State-use system. It gives the convict his chance to learn a useful trade and prevents greedy private interests exploiting him.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman was the author of the child-labor bill. It bears his name. It prevented the passing between the States of the products of child labor. Does not the gentleman know that the product of every convict, so far as commodities are concerned, displaces the labor of one free laborer outside of prison?

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman evidently favors the Booher bill. So do I.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If there are 400 convicts in the Atlanta Penitentiary making cotton goods, I will ask the gentleman whether that does not mean 400 free laborers outside will be displaced?

Mr. KEATING. Oh, no; that does not necessarily follow at all. The gentleman is speaking in the terms of about the eighteenth century. That is the trouble. I hope gentlemen on the Republican side of the House will not permit themselves to be led into the false position of opposing the State-use system.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am speaking in the terms of organized labor of four or five or ten years ago and in the language of the gentleman himself when he was advocating laws here forbidding interstate commerce in convict-made goods and in child-labor goods.

Mr. KEATING. I would be glad to have the gentleman quote my language, but he can not find any language that I ever used to sustain the statement he just made, and he can not name a responsible labor leader who supports the position he takes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asked for recognition a moment ago for the purpose of offering an amendment. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. AUSTIN: Strike out all after line 3, page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the United States convicts shall be used as follows: In the construction of such military roads as may be designated by the Secretary of War, or on the redemption of swamp lands to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior, or on levee work on rivers to be named by the Secretary of War."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be heard.

Mr. GOODALL. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the desk, and I would like to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there is an amendment pending to perfect the text, offered by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. GOODALL]. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOODALL: Page 1, line 4, after the word "establish," insert the word "and," and after the word "equip," on the same line, insert "and only for the duration of the present war to," so that the sentence as amended would read:

"That the Attorney General of the United States is authorized and directed to establish and equip, and only for the duration of the present war to maintain and operate," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is asked for.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 44.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, the amendment has been read, and I made a point of order against it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. AUSTIN. No. I am willing to leave it to the Chairman, in whom I have every confidence.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. WEBB. It changes the whole purpose of the bill.

Mr. AUSTIN. The purpose of the bill is to provide work for the convicts.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from North Carolina is sustained.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee moves to strike out the last three words.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that any opposition should be made to my substitute, because it provides for and takes care of this humanitarian feature of this bill by working the convicts in the open and not in competition with paid or free labor.

In the discussion here this afternoon, when the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] was opposing this measure, he was asked by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] about the value of the exports of cotton goods and the imports. I have the figures here for normal or peace times. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, we purchased from abroad manufactured cotton goods to the value of $70,704,823 and we exported American manufactured cotton goods to foreign countries to the value of $51,467,233, showing a balance in favor of the foreign manufacturers of cotton goods of $19,237,950.

Mr. WEBB. Will not the gentleman be frank enough to state that those imports of cotton goods were composed of the finest kind of laces and things of that kind that we do not make in this country?

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, we are making those fine cotton goods in this country in American mills. I am surprised that a gentleman representing 129 cotton mills located in his district should not know it. That was in normal times, prior to the war. Last year we purchased $4,144,500 more of foreign manufactured goods abroad than we did prior to the war—for the year ending June 30, 1914. What is this proposition? It is not to stop this convict cotton mill at the close of the war. It means to put the United States convicts in the manufacturing business for all time.

What else does it do? And let me especially have the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]. The people who work in his cotton mills and in the textile mills in the district I represent are natives of North Carolina and Tennessee. They are the plain, honest, common people, and in many of the towns where textile plants are located the employees are the daughters and sons of the very best citizens that we have.

You propose to take the Federal criminals and give them an industrial education in the manufacture of textile goods; and when you turn your industrial classes adrift in the South every year they are going to seek employment in our southern textile mills, and you are going to have your constituents and my constituents, of splendid character, working alongside of men who have been convicted in the Federal courts. And who are they? They will be murderers, robbers, burglars, post-office thieves, defaulters, counterfeiters, deserters, traitors, rapists, and white slavers. Those are the people whom you are going to train industrially and turn out, several hundred every year, to seek employment in the textile mills in the Southern States. You can not do this without the votes of southern Members of Congress, and I protest against it in the name of my constituents and the constituents of my colleagues from the South.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. AUSTIN. No; I have not time in five minutes. Every time one of our brave and honest soldiers is sheltered by an Army tent, he will have the knowledge that his tent was the work of convicts. By and by every time you walk into an office building in Washington City the furniture will be the handiwork of convicts and not of free American citizens. This is the entering wedge and the beginning to inaugurate a prison-manufacturing system in the United States in competition with honest, free, paid labor, and I enter my earnest protest against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. FESS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more in which to answer my question.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes.

Mr. WEBB. It will not require more than one minute to ask a question.

Mr. AUSTIN. It may require four minutes to answer it.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Tennessee be extended to five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman. I ask whether the gentleman from Illinois can take me off my feet when I have preferred a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. MADDEN. I can offer an amendment.

Mr. FESS. There is no such thing as an amendment to a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes; there is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair put the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], because it asked for the more generous allowance of time.

Mr. AUSTIN. I thank the gentleman from Ohio and I thank the gentleman from Illinois. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. What is the gentleman's objection to vocational training of the men who are in prison? And would the gentleman prefer to have returned to his district a vocationally trained man or a criminal who will always be regarded as an outcast and a convict?

Mr. AUSTIN. I am perfectly willing that my colleague from Ohio shall have every one of these Federal prisoners go to his district instead of mine after they leave the prison. I do not want any of them.

Mr. FESS. I want those who come to my district to be trained, efficient men, and not criminals.

Mr. AUSTIN. Yes; but many of them will always be criminals after they leave the walls of the penitentiary. If you want people of that kind associated with the boys and girls in the cotton mills of your district, people of standing and respectability, you are welcome to them.

Mr. FESS. They certainly will be criminals if my friend has his way, but they will not be criminals if they are trained vocationally.

Mr. AUSTIN. Oh, the gentleman is talking about a theory. He is dreaming.

Mr. FESS. I am not dreaming.

Mr. AUSTIN. Let us get down to earth. I would put these convicts at work on the construction of military roads. I would use them in the building of levees on the Mississippi River. I would utilize their labor in reclaiming countless thousands of acres of fertile and valuable swamp lands throughout this country.

We have tried the detestable convict-labor system in Tennessee, in the coal mines. We have had within the walls of our penitentiary factories which have been manufacturing furniture, stoves, and so forth, and in normal times they have undersold the goods manufactured by honest labor. They have always succeeded in underbidding the manufacturers in all these lines, and the coal operators, because the convict labor costs far less than free labor.

The counties have worked them on the road; States have worked them on the public road. The union and nonunion people in Tennessee are against the use of convict labor in mines and in factories. I consider one of the proudest acts of my life since early manhood was in fighting the vicious convict-lease system in Tennessee. I appeal to Members of the South. This evil is coming home first to us if this bill passes. This is not a war-emergency case, and the President does not so state in his letter. We have the proof here that factories are thoroughly equipped and ready to furnish all the cotton goods the Government needs. I have textile mills in the district I represent which can make all the Government needs. There is no sensible, just, or patriotic reason for the support of this miserable bill, which deserves the strongest condemnation and opposition of every man who respects the true interests of labor. [Applause.]

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I was impelled to take this five minutes of time by the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] partly by his appeal to the Members of the South to vote against this bill, and, as I understood him, on the ground that these men, if they become industrially qualified, might in all probability come to work in our factories and in our industrial plants, and by so doing, according to his position, contaminate our population. To my mind—and I speak with all respect to the gentleman, whom I hold in the highest esteem—he is speaking out of an impulse and not from critical analysis. To my mind his position is monstrous, morally monstrous, and for this reason: The purpose, as I understand it, of penalizing certain citizens for transgression of the law is not one of revenge—not visiting pain because pain has been visited—but is, on the contrary, for two purposes: First, as a deterrent, by restraining the dangerous individual so he can not commit a crime if he has a criminal impulse, and, in the second place, to restrain others by holding up to the noncriminal the result of criminality, the painful result of wrongdoing, and thus teaching them while still noncriminal what a criminal course will bring.

The next great purpose, as I understand it, should be the reformation of the convict. Now, there is nothing in punishment per se that is reformatory. There is nothing in punishment that can reform. The natural tendency of punishment itself is to harden, and it can only be justified on the ground of its restraining influence, the actual restraint of the criminal, and the moral restraint upon the noncriminal by the object lessons of the result of wrongdoing.

So if society is going to avoid the repetition of crime by men society must for the time the man is undergoing punishment bring to bear upon him those influences which are reformatory in character, and then, after he has been turned out of the penitentiary make the way as easy as possible for him to live correctly and not driving him back into a course of criminality.

Now, if you make a pariah out of a man once convicted of crime, if you shut all the doors of industrial activity in his face, though he may yearn to walk the straight and narrow path, very soon you have the man in such a desperate frame of mind that he comes to the conclusion that criminality and lawbreaking is the only source of livelihood left to him. This means the expenditure of millions of money, and the loss of an industrial unit that, if saved, would be productive to humanity as a whole. In addition to this it denies the teaching of every respectable religion in the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VENABLE. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts. Now, this is the situation: We are to deal with these unfortunates, many of whom are criminals because society itself is responsible.

Take the negroes of the South for illustration. Freed after the war, and because of bad management in the horrors of reconstruction, alienated from their white friends of the South, their former masters, they were left to largely take their own course. Here is a picanniny in Mississippi, possibly an illegitimate, starting out under the handicap of the sins of his father and mother, living in insanitary surroundings. The first sound that he hears, instead of being a mother's lullaby, soft with the intonations of love, is the ribald song of a brothel. The first prose he hears is a curse. From infancy to manhood he has no one to teach him, no one to guide his faltering steps. Society permits this condition, and when the man reaches the logical result of his environment, he becomes a criminal and society locks him up. What is true of that pickanniny in the illustration is largely true of many of the members of your criminal classes of the white race in the United States and the world over. What is to be gained in punishment? Unless during the process of punishment methods and influences of reform are brought to bear that man can not go out into the world a helpful, useful citizen, and when you close the door of hope in his face, when you deny him the right to make an honest living, society forces the man to continue in criminal pursuits, and then repeats the great injustice of punishing him for a thing for which society is possibly responsible.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VENABLE. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. If the logic of the gentleman's argument is good, then no man ought to be put in the penitentiary, because if he is affected by his environment he certainly will not gain anything by being associated with criminals in the penitentiary. My judgment is that you do not reform men by sending them to the penitentiary, and I have been trying to do that for a good many years as a manager of one of the penitentiaries.

Mr. VENABLE. The gentleman and I are in accord. I said there was nothing in punishment which was reformatory.

Mr. MADDEN. You do not accomplish the purpose sought to be accomplished by adding to the rigor of the employment of the convict.

Mr. VENABLE. I stated this, that while you have him in punishment, which system society must adopt on the principle of self-defense, those influences must be brought to bear which will reform, because there is nothing inherent in punishment of a reformatory character. You can do this. You can bring the reformatory agencies to bear upon him; you can equip him for honest employment, and then if you do that you must open the avenue for honest employment for him when he goes out into the world. Otherwise you, perforce, drive him back into criminal pursuits.

Mr. BAER. Does the gentleman not think that society owes a greater debt to these people to whom the gentleman refers, by trying to make them better before they get arrested. Does the gentleman not think society should start the reform before they get into jail?

Mr. VENABLE. Undoubtedly. I said society, and by society I do not mean the Government. I mean you and I and the rest of us, all humanity—that we are largely responsible for our neglect of the other fellow, which neglect develops him into a criminal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. VENABLE. I would like to have a minute more.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VENABLE. The great argument, it strikes me, for equipping these men for industrial life, whether it takes them to the North or the South or the East or the West, is this, and it is founded upon the verities of true morality, the teaching of every religion that is worthy of the name, namely, that you and I are our brother's keeper. We are commanded to love our neighbors as ourselves, and even our enemies, and if that have a correct definition, it is surely that you and I should desire the highest good of our fellow creatures and have the will to bring that good about wherever we have the opportunity. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Was the committee amendment comprehended between lines 7 and 17, on page 2, adopted by the Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. It was.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to speak for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that some of the ideas which have been expressed on this bill, I am sorry to say, on my side of the House, are worse than medieval and would tend to keep a man who was once a convict always a criminal. Now, it is an entire fallacy, it seems to me, that anybody is harmed if a convict works and produces something; that instead of being a harm to the country it is a good to the country, and his competition is no greater inside a certain set of walls, where he has been sent by the Government, than outside somewhere else. He has got to get a living somewhere, and he does far more harm outside in getting it in the way that he has been doing than he does inside. This prison subject seems to be a subject on which men go to extremes. In the first place, there are men who speak extremely sentimentally about it, who favor the treating of prisoners as if they were——

A MEMBER. Company.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; treating them as if they were company, so to speak, give them the best there is and coddle them. On the other hand, there are men who want them to be kept in perpetual idleness, learning nothing. It certainly is a good thing for the prisoners, the best thing for them, to do work, and to work as nearly as possible under commercial conditions. Now, the labor unions to-day are not opposed to bills of this kind. They formerly did oppose them, but being composed of reasonable people, some years ago they got together and decided that such plans for prison work as this bill proposes do not harm labor. You could not blame them for opposing some of the former convict-labor systems, where contracts were made for prison labor and prison-made goods were sent out and sold at lower prices than other similar goods, for such competition was unfair.

One idea that has been expressed here, I am sorry to say by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN], was to the effect that he did not want to see criminals trained to do any work and come back and work in his part of the country. He apparently would prefer to have them come back untrained and keep on in their criminal pursuits.

It is absolutely proven that a great many men are criminals because they have never learned to do anything useful or to do anything well. They are not so different from other people. You give them something to do and teach them to do it well and teach them habits of industry and they can go out and work most anywhere and do it very well. The so-called graduates of Sing Sing, under the régime of Thomas Mott Osborne, a régime which I think was extreme and with some of which I disagreed strongly, often did well. They learned how to work, and apparently few people had any serious objection to working alongside of them, which shows they are not so different from other people. Now, so far as taking care of the prisoners who are habitual criminals is concerned, that is being done through the indeterminate sentences, which keeps the incorrigibles in prison right along. There is no reason why that should not be done. I think this bill is only remotely a "war measure," but I think there is every reason why it should be passed on general principles. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. WEBB. Will not the gentleman permit us to read the first line of the next section, and then I will move to rise.

Mr. MADDEN. All right.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That from and after July 1, 1918, articles so manufactured shall not be purchased from any source other than governmental for the United States Government, or any department, bureau, or other agency thereof, unless the Attorney General or his authorized agent shall certify that the same can not be furnished by such prison factory or factories, and no claim shall be audited or paid without such certificate.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that for a minute.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Has the section been read?

Mr. MADDEN. No; we only wanted to read one line.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. This is open to amendment to-morrow if adjournment takes place now?

Mr. WEBB. Has the section been read?

The CHAIRMAN. Only part of it.

Mr. WEBB. Is there objection to reading the section through and leaving it open to amendment to-morrow? Let us finish the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed and finished the reading of the section.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. This is going to be open to amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I understood that only one section was to be read.

The CHAIRMAN. It is only one section.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Clerk read section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. No; section 2.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the committee do now rise.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 11, 1918.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, O God, for the spirit of helpfulness which prevails throughout our great country to-day. More and more are we seeking to benefit mankind. Our millions are being piled up on the altar of sacrifice and service. Our thought is going out to the world. We have world problems, and we are thinking and speaking in world terms. We thank Thee that we are not living for ourselves alone but are seeking to save other nations from ruin and slavery. It is a mighty task we face, but Thou hast made us a mighty people. We are conscious of our limitations, but we can do all things through Him who strengtheneth us.

O Thou omnipotent one, do Thou stretch out Thy hand and arrest the onrushing tide of slaughter and desolation on the battle fields of Europe to-day. Judge Thou among the nations and rebuke the guilty. Command that they beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks, so that they shall not again lift up the sword against nations, neither learn war any more. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have here a numerously signed petition relating to the development of power sites upon the Missouri River in South Dakota. The petition is signed by hundreds, perhaps the names will run into the thousands, and they include the governor of the State and all the State officials. I ask that the petition, which is brief, may be read by the Secretary, and then, because of the relation of the development of these power sites to navigation, I ask that the petition may be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the petition was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

To the SOUTH DAKOTA DELEGATION IN CONGRESS.

GENTLEMEN: Your petitioners, citizens of South Dakota, most earnestly request you to use every influence in your power to secure provision from this Congress for the survey of the power sites upon the Missouri River in South Dakota. We represent that even if provision is made this year that actual expenditure of money under such act will necessarily be delayed several months, if not for a year or more, and we ask for congressional action at this time, that there may be no unnecessary delay in the accomplishment of the work when the war is over.

Mr. GERRY. I present a resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD.

The resolution is as follows:

[State of Rhode Island, etc., in General Assembly. January session, A. D. 1918.]

Resolution relating to certain measures now pending in Congress.

Whereas the House of Representatives of the United States has passed a proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending equal suffrage to the women of our Nation; and

Whereas the proposed amendment is now before the Senate of the United States for consideration; and

Whereas all the political parties of Rhode Island have declared in their platforms for equal suffrage; and

Whereas the Legislature of Rhode Island at its last session passed the presidential suffrage bill; and

Whereas equal suffrage has been indorsed by the President of the United States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be requested to vote for the equal suffrage amendment; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President and Vice President of the United States and to the representatives of our State in the Senate of the United States.

STATE OF RHODE ISLAND,
Office of the Secretary of State, Providence:

I hereby certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the original resolution approved by his excellency the governor on the 19th day of April in the year 1918.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of the State of Rhode Island this 22d day of April in the year 1918.

[SEAL.] J. FRED PARKER,
Secretary of State.

Mr. CURTIS presented a resolution adopted by the Southwestern Millers' League, of Wichita, Kans., favoring legislation providing for the establishment of standard weights and measures for flour, meal, and commercial feeding stuff, which was referred to the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures.

He also presented a petition of the Congregation of the First Methodist Church, of Winfield, Kans., and a petition of the Commercial Association, of Winfield, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide arrangement with the allied nations for the setting aside of a day for fasting and prayer, etc., which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Pap Thomas Post, No. 52, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Kansas, of Great Bend, Kans., praying for an increase of pensions of veterans of the Civil War, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I present a resolution adopted by the Association of Woman Suffrage of the District of Columbia, favoring the passage of the so-called Susan B. Anthony amendment now pending in the Senate. The resolution is brief, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution favoring the Anthony amendment now in the Senate.

Whereas the Anthony amendment enfranchising all the women of the United States, passed the House of Representatives by a two-thirds majority on January 10, 1918; and

Whereas it is now before the United States Senate, to be acted upon by that body; and

Whereas the women of the Nation are anxiously watching the action of the Senate on this amendment; and

Whereas, if it should not pass the Senate, there would be great disappointment to the people of the country, and President Wilson's advocated broader democracy would be lost: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Federal Suffrage Association of the United States request the United States Senate to act upon this amendment as soon as possible and secure its passage.

OLYMPIA BROWN, President.
Mrs. CLARA W. MCNAUGHTON,
Chairman Executive Committee.

Passed by the association May 4, 1918.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I also present a resolution adopted by the Hawaiian Protective Association, favoring prohibition in Hawaii. The resolution is brief, and I ask that it may be set out in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution.

Whereas the "Ahahui Puuhonua o na Hawaii" (Hawaiian Protective Association), representing the Hawaiian race, is endeavoring in every way to protect the Hawaiian people from everything that is disastrous to their life and general welfare, thereby continuing the struggle of Hawaii's early leaders to maintain and to promote the best traditions and principles of their forefathers; and

Whereas experience and facts have shown and proven that alcoholic drinks are an evil and a menace to the social, educational, physical, moral, and spiritual welfare of the Hawaiian as well as of the other races in this Territory; and

Whereas alcoholic drinks have been proven to be detrimental and perilous to the mental, moral, and physical welfare of the fighting men of our country, thus making the elimination of the same a proper and effective war measure at this time when our country is engaged in the world-wide war; and

Whereas the war conditions in our country are demanding with imperative force the immediate application of all effective means for the successful carrying out of our country's war measures, and that from such a standpoint prohibition in Hawaii is an immediate necessity, imminent; and that while we do believe in and adhere to the home-rule doctrine, we do recognize that the emergency occasioned by the war must be met now, and in order to accomplish it the home-rule doctrine must be suspended: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Hon. J. K. KALANIANAOLE, Delegate to Congress, be petitioned by the Ahahui Puuhonua o na Hawaii (Hawaiian Protective Association), through its officers, to obtain in the Congress of the United States the passage of a Federal prohibition bill for Hawaii; that a copy of this memorial and resolution be spread on the minutes of this association; that attested copies of the same be forwarded to the President of the United States, to the President of the Senate, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to Hawaii's Delegate to Congress.

Signed by its officers and directors

J. K. KALANIANAOLE, President.
JOHN C. LANE, Vice President.
JESSE ULUIHI, Secretary.
HENRY KAPELA, Auditor.
SAMUEL C. DWIGHT, Treasurer.

POSTAL RATES ON SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I desire to give notice of a motion to suspend the rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

I hereby give notice in writing that on Monday, the 13th day of May, 1918, I shall move to suspend rule 16 of the Standing Rules of the Senate, which provides that "No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any appropriation bill," in order that I may present the following amendment to H. R. 7237, an act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, etc.:

On page 32, line 14, add the following new section:

"SEC. 13. The operation of sections 1101, 1102, 1103, 1104, 1105, and 1106 of an act entitled 'An act to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes,' approved October 3, 1917, which said sections refer to postal rates on second-class mail, be, and is hereby, postponed from July 1, 1918, as in such sections provided, to July 1, 1919."

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business?

Mr. ASHURST. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8696) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no further morning business, the morning business is closed, and the Senator from Arizona moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may ask the Senator, I realize, perhaps, that the conference report would have the right of way, but can the Senator give me an assurance as to how long it will be likely to take? I am very anxious to have the pending bill providing a rent administrator for the District of Columbia disposed of as promptly as possible.

Mr. ASHURST. Let me say to the Senator from Ohio I appreciate his desire for haste, and I share the desire with him; yet this conference report, Senators will bear in mind, was made some three weeks ago, and one item in it caused the Senate to send it back to the conference committee. I am sure there will be no great controversy over it. I do not apprehend that it will take over 15 or 20 minutes, because the report has been printed in the RECORD for nearly a month and those interested in the subject are familiar with it.

Mr. POMERENE. I know the Senator's desire to have the appropriation bill finally disposed of, and I am not disposed to object.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona wish to have the report read?

Mr. ASHURST. I do not care to have it read. It was printed in the RECORD three weeks ago and printed again yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST subsequently said: Mr. President, about an hour ago the Senate agreed to the conference report on the Indian appropriation bill. I have been asked by a number of Senators with reference to amendment No. 60. I wish to say that the only substantial change in amendment No. 60 is the striking out of the last proviso. The said proviso is merely a repetition of existing law. Under existing law the removal of restrictions, the loaning of money, and the investing or depositing of Indian funds must be done under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior and be approved by him.

Amendment No. 60, as agreed upon in conference, in no way changes the right of the Secretary of the Interior as to the removal of restrictions, the loaning, investing, and depositing of Indian funds of the Five Tribes.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I do not care to take any time of the Senate. I merely wish to say that the statement made by the Senator from Arizona is, in my judgment, correct.

RENT ADMINISTRATOR FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. POMERENE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 9248.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9248) to prevent extortion, to impose taxes upon certain incomes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sterling
Bankhead	Kellogg	Nugent	Sutherland
Colt	Kendrick	Overman	Swanson
Culberson	Kenyon	Page	Thomas

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is unavoidably absent on official business.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness.

Mr. LEWIS. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained by illness, and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] is absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, the pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to strike from the bill section 13. Section 13 provides that if a house is not occupied for three months before the passage of the act or for five months after the passage of the act by the owner or a tenant, it may be commandeered by the President for war or Government purposes. We were edified yesterday afternoon by a long and somewhat heated argument as to the part the Constitution would play in connection with this section. It would be tempting to reply to that argument if it had anything to do with the case, but it has not; and as I am anxious to get the bill passed as soon as possible, I shall not go into that part of it. Suffice it to say that no one has attacked the Constitution. This section is made absolutely constitutional, and it is merely a question of whether or not the Senate desires to adopt the section. The bill came over from the other House a few weeks ago in a very drastic form. The suggestion of a rent administrator came from the real estate interests in this District, who felt that the bill passed by the other House was more drastic than they could live under. The bill was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, not composed of statesmen and orators and constitutional lawyers, but of men who were left over after the more important committees were taken care of. However, I have not found those men to be socialists, or anarchists, or bolshevists, or anything else that it is fashionable at the time to call the man who does not agree with you. I have found them to be rather conservative, dignified, intellectual gentlemen who want to do the right thing. I have never known one of them to suggest taking anything away from anyone without giving him full compensation.

These gentlemen did adopt the rent-administration idea. They took testimony; they found that there were several hundred houses in the District of Columbia not occupied, and they thought it wise either to commandeer those houses for war or Government purposes or else to persuade the owners to have them occupied. Tears are not to be wept here for those men who are deprived of their homes because they choose to go away and leave their homes for five months. A man may love his home and leave it for five months and allow a friend or some one else to occupy it in war times. This bill does not provide that a house is to be taken from the owner and rented to some one else. In my judgment, such action would not be legal under the section. It does provide, however, that the President, if he sees fit, may commandeer a house for war or Government purposes. The rent administrator is to fix the rental and the conditions under which the house shall be used by the Government for war or Government purposes. The rentals are to be paid by the Government to the owner. The owner is not remitted to sue some one who may be put in as a tenant. That language can not be found in the bill.

I do not think the proposition can be defended that we are to say what rent may be charged and at the same time permit houses to remain idle in the District of Columbia, not occupied by anyone. In order that we may have a vote, I shall not pursue this matter further, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator a question in reference to the language of the bill which is contained in line 21, 22, and 23, on page 17, which reads as follows:

> SEC. 13. That any house or building not occupied by the owner or a tenant for a period of three months immediately preceding the passage of this act, or for a period of five months after the passage of this act, may be commandeered by the President of the United States.

I have not been able to hear all of the discussion upon the bill, but in what I have heard I have not heard any Senator give any reason why that language should be in the bill. I therefore ask the Senator from New Hampshire, if a person had a house in Washington which was vacant, and he had not occupied it himself or by a tenant for a period of three months just preceding the passage of this act, but if he moved into it and occupied it, or if it was occupied by a tenant the next day after the act went into force, could not the President in that case commandeer the house just the same as though it were vacant?

Mr. HOLLIS. There has been an amendment inserted in line 21 which makes the language read:

> That any vacant house or building not occupied.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. HOLLIS. If the house has not been occupied for three months prior to the passage of the act—which we all concede will be a very busy time—or five months after the passage of the act—which may not be so busy, because Congress may adjourn—if that period is continuous for three months in one case or for five months in the other, then, after such three months' continuous nonoccupancy or five months' continuous nonoccupancy, as the case may be, such house may be commandeered, if that answers the Senator's question.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not sure that I have made myself plain to the Senator from New Hampshire. I can see clearly why, if a house is vacant for a specified time after the law is passed, as the bill fixes it, for five months, that there is reason why, under existing conditions, it should be used for some purpose; but I do not understand why, if a house is occupied immediately after the passage of the act and remains occupied by the owner or by a tenant, the President should be given authority to take that house simply because some time before the act was passed the house was vacant for three months.

Mr. HOLLIS. I understand what the Senator means, and that is why I said that the bill had been amended so as to read:

That any vacant house or building not occupied—

And so forth.

Mr. NORRIS. But that would not change the condition I have stated.

Mr. HOLLIS. If a house is occupied, it could not be commandeered even if it had been vacant for three months or five months previously.

Mr. NORRIS. The insertion of the word "vacant," as I understand, at least would not change the condition supposed in the illustration which I have given. Let us take a concrete case as an illustration. Suppose that the Senator from Nebraska owned a house, or anyone else owned a house, in Washington and it was vacant for three months; but the day this act is passed or the next day after it is passed and goes into effect the Senator occupied the house himself, or that he leased it so that it was occupied or in use, would we want to give the President the right to commandeer that house simply because at some time in the past it had been vacant?

Mr. HOLLIS. No; we would not; and the President would not have the right to commandeer it, because at that time it would not be vacant. The act as amended provides for the commandeering of a vacant house or building.

Mr. NORRIS. If the word "vacant" has the meaning for which the Senator from New Hampshire contends, then certainly the language I have called attention to has no place in the bill. I am assuming that the house is vacant before the law went into effect.

Mr. HOLLIS. Let us make the Senator's case a little more definite. We will assume that this bill passes and becomes a law on the 1st day of July; that for three months preceding the 1st day of July a house has been vacant, but that on the 2d day of July, or before the President can act, the house is occupied. Then, of course, the house could not be commandeered, because it would not be a vacant house.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, let us see whether that would be true if the word "vacant" were inserted after the word "any." It would then read:

That any vacant house or building not occupied by the owner or tenant for a period of three months immediately preceding the passage of this act, * * * may be commandeered by the President.

Why could not the President commandeer the house?

Mr. HOLLIS. Because the house that has been vacant for three months before the passage of the act is occupied before the President commandeers it; it is not vacant. There must be both vacancy and the existence of the three months' period of nonoccupancy before the house can be commandeered or at the time the house is commandeered. It seems to me that is very clear. I can not believe that the Senator's mind and mine have met on this subject, it seems so clear to me. Certainly if any house is occupied when the President undertakes to commandeer it, he can not commandeer it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have listened with attention to the addresses of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] upon the pending measure yesterday afternoon, and was both edified and instructed by their comments upon its constitutionality.

The Senator from Missouri has been perfectly consistent in his attitude upon all, or practically all, of the measures which we have had under consideration since our entry into the war. His argument, from the standpoint of his premises, is always conclusive, and he always has the courage of his convictions; but inasmuch as the discussion has in some degree led to the conclusion that those of us who propose to support this bill must do so in defiance of our oaths to support the Constitution, I am not willing that we shall come to a vote without replying, as best I can and very briefly, to the fundamental question presented and affecting the validity of the bill.

We have sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and our oaths are, or they should be, absolutely binding upon our conscience and our official conduct. No man who apprehends this bill to be in conflict with the provisions and requirements of the Constitution should vote for it, nor do I believe he will. I do not think it offends that instrument.

It is very difficult, Mr. President, and especially during times of war, to draw a distinct line of division between that which is and that which is not forbidden by the organic charter of the Republic; indeed, if we follow the course of congressional legislation and apply to that legislation the various decisions of the court of last resort, we must conclude that the popular conception of and the actual authority conferred upon us by the Constitution even 30 years ago have been materially changed and extended. During our 125 or 130 years of national life this change has been far-reaching and in some respects revolutionary. A great British statesman has said that constitutions are not written but they are made; and the truth of the reflection is amply illustrated by the development of the Constitution of the United States, whose implied powers and those conferred upon Congress under the general clause have been more formidable—certainly more ample—than those expressly enumerated.

Mr. President, it is difficult, as I have said, to attempt to define with any degree of satisfaction the extent to which the crises of war suspend or alter constitutional provisions and limitations; but we do know, as was said by Mr. Lincoln during the Civil War, that the President should have the power to do whatever may be necessary to bring war to a successful conclusion. Of course, it may be urged that if this suggestion is to be accepted without qualification it might result in substituting the will of the Executive not only for the Congress but also for the Constitution. Nevertheless, I accept that statement. The assertion of Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, made during the consideration of the bill for the admission of the State of West Virginia in 1862 or 1863, that the laws of war prevailed in times of war, and that the laws of war are what the Congress determines to be necessary, so long as they do not conflict with the rights of humanity, may be too extreme.

That is another general expression, the literal acceptance of which might lead to the same result, and to substitute the whim or the will of Congress or the administration or of both for the written charter of our powers, the Constitution of the United States.

But, Mr. President, this bill does not confront us with the necessity of determining whether we are proceeding beyond the boundaries of the Constitution. If it were of general application we might be required to do so. I am free to say that if this bill were designed to be of universal application, affecting the home cities of the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Minnesota as it does the District of Columbia, I should be inclined to agree with their views regarding our power to enact it, and particularly regarding our power to enact section 13. I was aware—and I am glad the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] has emphasized it—that section 13 does not assume to do more than to invest the President with the power to commandeer vacant buildings for public purposes. That makes it harmonize, I think, with the criticisms which have been made of the bill as well as of the section, from the constitutional standpoint.

Mr. President, this bill is a local one; it affects only the territory known as the District of Columbia and property rights in that District. The Constitution gives in express terms to Congress exclusive control and jurisdiction over the District. That control is absolute, except as it may be limited by those general principles of justice and of constitutional power affecting the rights of persons and of property. Ever since the decision of the Supreme Court in the great case of Cohens v. Virginia (6 Wheaton, 264), during the first quarter century of the Nation's existence, absolute power of control over the District of Columbia by the Congress of the United States, subject, of course, to these limitations, has been an established principle of law, which indeed, Mr. President, logically proceeds from the purposes for which the District was provided for in the Constitution and afterwards created in pursuance of it. That purpose is that it shall be the seat of government. The segregation from the States of Maryland and Virginia of a certain portion of their respective territories, placing it at the disposal of the newly-created Government, was for its purposes fundamentally and primarily, and as a consequence, Mr. President, the framers of the Constitution very naturally and very properly clothed the legislative department of the Government with absolute control of it. Residence here by those whose presence is not required for governmental purposes is perfectly proper and lawful, but it is entirely secondary to the object in view when the segregation took place and since that time. I may own a residence in the city of Washington. That, however, is an incident to the creation of the District and the laying out of the city. Both were for governmental purposes, and, in my judgment, it must follow as a necessary corollary that, subject to the indestructible rights of person and property, the Government, whenever it becomes necessary for its purposes, in the opinion of its representatives, may take over every acre of territory in the District and dispossess, subject to proper compensation, every resident in it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it the position of the Senator from Colorado that the fifth amendment, guaranteeing that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation, is not in force in the District of Columbia?

Mr. THOMAS. It is absolutely in force in the District of Columbia, as a matter of course. I have just stated that this power was subject to the indestructible rights of person and property, some of which are safeguarded by the provisions of the amendment which the Senator has just read.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then I think the Senator must have misunderstood the position which the Senator from Minnesota took.

Mr. THOMAS. That is possible.

Mr. KELLOGG. Because it was stated, as I recollect it:

> It may be, therefore, especially in time of war, when there is a sudden and very great influx of population in the District of Columbia engaged in the various activities of war, that it may be necessary not only to procure means for housing the employees but to protect them from extortion in rental charges.

In which event it would be a public purpose, and Congress could regulate the charges, but the charges must be reasonable.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if I even indirectly misrepresented what the Senator stated I am very sorry. I recognized his position and intended referring to it just a little later. I may say here, Mr. President, that the arguments of the two Senators to whom I have referred were very different in their character, one going very much further than the other. Generally speaking, I feel in accord with many things asserted by the Senator from Minnesota on yesterday, except in so far as peculiar conditions here would limit the application of some of them. I do not for a moment maintain that any personal or real property can or should be taken over by the Government anywhere without making just compensation, but that compensation must be determined not by the opinion of the owner as to what it should be, but by methods either existent or to be created for its fair determination.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then may I ask the Senator whether his view is that any property and all property may be taken over for war purposes in the District of Columbia, and that Congress should determine whether that taking is for war purposes, or whether it is also competent for Congress to delegate to some one else the determination of the question whether the taking is for war purposes; and, if so, would that be the wise course to pursue, or ought Congress to determine it?

Mr. THOMAS. In times of war, Mr. President, I have no doubt but that the Executive has the power to take over upon his own initiative whatever property in this District he thinks is necessary for the proper prosecution of the war. In times of peace, there being no such emergency, the subject should be regulated by legislation. But I think there can be no doubt, Mr. President, that should the needs of the Government, in the opinion of the Government authorities, become commensurate with the territorial jurisdiction known as the District of Columbia, the Government, through legislation, can repossess itself of it all, even in times of peace, subject, of course, to the constitutional limitations which safeguard the rights of person and of property.

Mr. President, I do not think that is a startling doctrine, nor at all new. During the last Congress we enacted a measure of absolute prohibition in this District. It was assailed, as this bill is assailed, upon constitutional grounds; but we did it, and by that means we deprived of their property citizens of the District engaged in the pursuit of what before the enactment of that law was a perfectly legitimate industry, an industry sanctioned by law, an industry subject to taxation. We destroyed it overnight and made no pretense of compensation, except in so far as the postponement of the time when the act was to go into effect enabled those owning the property affected by the law to dispose of it. I believe we had the power to do that. Of course, when the subject is fully analyzed, liquor occupies a different status from almost every other article of merchandise, but the fundamental fact is that legislation affecting the District of Columbia and destroying personal property utterly, thus depriving a good many of the citizens of this District of absolute value, was enacted under the provision of the Constitution giving us exclusive control and authority over this District. I might mention other instances where this power has been exercised, but it is not necessary. Suffice it to say that all we attempt to do here is to meet an existing crisis and meet it in the best way.

Mr. President, what is the situation in the District of Columbia? Since the beginning of this war I think it is safe to say that the population of the city of Washington has increased 40 per cent, but during the same time its housing capacity has perhaps increased less than 10 per cent. The increase is abnormal, it is unnatural, it is artificial, but it is the inevitable and necessary consequence of our declaration of war. Two of our departments have expanded perhaps two or three hundred per cent, and new bureaus of activity have been created in the interval. In times of war, therefore, the Government located at Washington is not only engaged in those activities which are designed to directly prosecute and carry on the war, but in others which, though operating indirectly to that end, are quite as important. We are controlling now the transportation system of the United States. The Government has taken charge of our food problems and of our fuel problems. We have a huge bureau of public information here, and all these agencies have necessitated this abnormal increase in population.

Mr. President, these Government employees and officials who have thus been brought here, adding to a congestion that was already acute, are in the service of the United States in time of war. A great many of them may be supernumeraries; I think they are; but, nevertheless, they are here, in the Government service, for the purpose of aiding the Government in the prosecution of the war. Many of them are without shelter. Many of them find it difficult to live within their means. Some of them perhaps find it difficult to make compensation for the absolute necessities of life, exclusive of shelter. How can they carry on their work effectively unless they are sheltered, unless they are fed, and unless they are relieved of the apprehensions consequent upon the danger that they will fail in either of these requirements, which necessarily interfere with and diminish their efficiency?

Why, Mr. President, this is just as much of a war measure, just as much of a necessity, as though we were speeding up a mobilization because the German Army, or some portion of it, were upon our territory and marching toward the Capital. The Army is not the only agency in war. It has been said on this floor a number of times, and it is true, that modern war consists in marshaling against the enemy every asset and resource of the Nation; these people who must be here, whose activities are absolutely essential to the prosecution of the war, whether successfully or not, must be taken care of, and the only way in which it can be done is through a measure of this sort, which is as completely within the power of the Congress of the United States, in my judgment, as though the authority were expressly written in the Constitution. Indeed, I go further. I think that if we fail to pass a measure like this in such an emergency, the war power of the President is sufficiently extensive to justify him in taking possession of such structures as may be necessary for the sheltering of the civic army in Washington, subject, of course, to compensation by the Government of those whose property is thus acquired. Of course, it is better, Mr. President, to do it in this way; but when it comes to the constitutional power of meeting such an emergency in time of war my opinion is that it is not only within our lawful right, but that it is our duty to act affirmatively and to enact a measure of this kind; and we can not wait.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I quite agree with the position taken by the Senator, and I am under the impression that that course has already been pursued by the President and the War Department. Before this matter was up at all they actually did take over certain properties. I do not know what arrangements were made.

Mr. THOMAS. I am obliged to the Senator for the suggestion.

I say we can not wait, Mr. President, because the exigency is right upon us. It is all very well, in a crisis of this kind, to talk about providing for condemnation or contracts, and for the marshaling of the usual agencies in time of peace to secure what is now needed; but we can not wait for that. Just before the Battle of New Orleans Gen. Jackson, having declared martial law in that city and its surroundings, confronted interference with some of his plans by a writ of habeas corpus issued by the United States district judge. Gen. Jackson had no time to consider the legality or the merits of the writ. His business at that moment was to whip the British Army. As a consequence he imprisoned the judge, metaphorically tore his writ of habeas corpus to pieces, and threw it in his face.

He then met the emergency, won a great victory, abolished martial law, after which he went as a citizen of the United States to the court room, plead guilty to a charge of contempt, paid his fine, and went on his way rejoicing.

Suppose Gen. Jackson had been halted in the operations essential to the accomplishment of that great and notable victory by going into court with his return to the writ and suspending the activities of his army until it could be determined whether this writ of habeas corpus had been properly or improperly issued? Now, of course this emergency is not so great as the one cited; but it indicates the conditions with which we are confronted, and fairly illustrates the powers and the necessity of the exercise of the powers of authority, however arbitrary they may be, in times of war, when the emergency demands it.

Nor, Mr. President, am I very much disturbed by the very eloquent and somewhat mournful prophecies of what is to become of the Constitution of the United States and to the people of this great Republic if acts like this be passed. It is perfectly natural to imagine and prophesy such things with the utmost earnestness and conviction; and sometimes they materialize; but we must remember that such are the forebodings whenever a measure demanded by an extraordinary emergency in times of war is proposed by a constitutional government. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from 1861 to 1864 is replete with similar statements, similar reflections, similar predictions, coupled unfortunately with much epithet and personal abuse which those indulging in that sort of so-called argument must have sincerely regretted in after years.

Mr. President, Senator James A. Bayard, of Delaware—the father of Thomas F. Bayard, who was afterwards Secretary of State of the United States, one of the most eminent and patriotic statesmen who ever adorned public life, one of the ornaments of the Senate in his time, a man whose death is not so remote but that some of us remember his personal charm, his ability, and his courage, was a Member of the Thirty-seventh Congress.

Senate joint resolution No. 1 of Congress was designed to approve and confirm certain acts of the President of the United States for suppressing insurrection and rebellion. It was vigorously and vindictively opposed by the minority then in the Senate, and if I remember the history of that resolution it was also opposed by some of the majority Senators. It may not be instructive but it is comforting to refer to some of the criticisms of a distinguished statesman of another generation during his discussion of that resolution and to realize that his fears were pronounced unsubstantial by the verdict of time. On page 17 of the appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE of the Thirty-seventh Congress, first session, appears Mr. Bayard's argument against the resolution. Among other things he said:

> Mr. President, there is no other distinction between the condition of France under Louis XIV and the present condition of these United States, if this resolution be passed. The Bastile had its dungeons; the forts have none. Louis XIV alone issued his lettres de cachet, but the President of the United States delegates a general power to 1 or 10 different officers to arrest and imprison guiltless men whenever the officer chooses to suspect them of criminal complicity; and all this is to be sanctioned and continued in the face of a Constitution which we had supposed gave us, as citizens of a free country, free institutions, in contradistinction to the absolutism which reigned in France under Louis XIV.

And on page 18:

> An honorable Senator has told us that he would be willing at this time to yield almost unlimited power to the Executive. Sir, if you pass this resolution you give unlimited power to the President of the United States; you take away the last remnant of liberty in this country; you abandon to him the great judicial right which protects the liberty of the citizen, in the face of the Constitution, without judging of the exigency for yourselves or avowing to the people, by direct legislation that you have parted with that right. Suppose that Abraham Lincoln was a man of great force of will, of great military talent, great ambition, and with sufficient capacity as a statesman to govern and discretely control the career of his ambition in the pursuit of permanent power. I ask you if a Cromwell or a Bonaparte were invested with the powers you now propose to place in the hands of the President of the United States, if the liberties of this country would not lie at his feet? Sir, for one, without regard to the man, I will look upon anyone in reference to the grant of such unlimited power as a Cromwell or a Bonaparte. I can not expect from the past history of humanity that the next 18 centuries will produce the equal of George Washington.

That, Mr. President, has a very familiar sound in these days. I might quote similarly from many other distinguished statesmen of the war period, but it is unnecessary. This was uttered by Senator James A. Bayard, and his son, Thomas F. Bayard, who succeeded him March 4, 1869, in the Senate lived to see the memory of Abraham Lincoln enshrined in the hearts not only of the people of the North but of the South. His son has paid to Mr. Lincoln a great tribute of appreciation. He realized long before his death that absolute power in this country is with the people ultimately, and that we as its Representatives, in meeting the supreme needs of a war crisis, do not abandon our authority nor permanently delegate it. That which we have given we can take back whenever the emergency requiring it has passed. This bill is a temporary war measure. It is as much needed, in my judgment, Mr. President, as reenforcements in France. Therefore I hope that it will meet with the approval of a majority of this body.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I desire to speak for a moment in regard to section 13. As I expressed it on yesterday, I am in sympathy with the general purposes of the bill, but it seems to me that section 13 is in a class by itself, and neither in the subject matter of the section itself nor in the power it confers on the rent administrator is it like anything else in the bill.

The question of the taking of property without just compensation is involved, and my contention is that instead of this section 13 being plainly constitutional, as asserted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], it, on its face, ignores the fundamental proposition that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation.

But what does it in terms permit? It takes the dwelling left vacant for three months prior to the passage of this act, or vacant for five months after the passage of the act, and puts it in the power of the rent administrator to take possession of that property, to take its use and fix the rental and determine the conditions of the tenancy in his absolute discretion. Under it he may take a dwelling the ordinary rental of which would be $100 per month, and in his discretion may pay $5 per month in behalf of the Government.

Mr. President, since this section stands alone, since it relates to a subject different from any other in the bill, it is very doubtful, to say the least, whether the general provisions of the bill in regard to a review by a board of appeals and a final review by the court will apply. There is very high and respectable authority to the effect that where discretion is given to a public functionary in regard to the acts and duties of that functionary it is beyond the control of any other body to review or interfere in any way whatever with the exercise of that discretion.

So I contend, Mr. President, that section 13, on its face, absolutely ignores the question of just compensation and permits the taking of the use of the property without any provision whatever for the payment of an equivalent of the value of that use, which is just compensation.

I wish now, Mr. President, just to call attention to other commandeering acts or provisions that have been enacted by this Congress and in other bills. The power to commandeer or requisition is given the President in many instances, but always the principle of just compensation is recognized and provided for. Let me read from the food-control act, section 12, for example. It provides:

> SEC. 12. That whenever the President shall find it necessary to secure an adequate supply of necessaries for the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or for any other public use connected with the common defense, he is authorized to requisition and take over, for use or operation by the Government, any factory, packing house, oil pipe line, mine, or other plant, or any part thereof, in or through which any necessaries are or may be manufactured, produced, prepared, or mined, and to operate the same. Whenever the President shall determine that the further use or operation by the Government of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof, is not essential for the national security or defense, the same shall be restored to the person entitled to the possession thereof.

And now comes the particular provision relative to the compensation.

> The United States shall make just compensation, to be determined by the President, for the taking over, use, occupation, and operation by the Government of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof.

Then, as Senators will remember, it is provided that if the compensation determined upon by the President is not accepted by the owner of the property, 75 per cent of that compensation so determined by the President shall be paid him, and he shall have his remedy in the court to recover the balance of what he claims to be just and equitable compensation.

Mr. President, I grant that we are in a state of war, and the fact that we are in a state of war is the occasion and the reason for the enactment of this legislation. But, Mr. President, it is not permissible in war even that private property shall be taken for public use without just compensation and it can not be. Compensation must sometime be made. The principle of just compensation for property taken for public use is a very old one. It antedates our Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence by hundreds of years. It was in the civil law and laid down in terms not very different from those embodied in State and Federal constitutions. Quoting from Watson on the Constitution, he says:

It was a provision in the Napoleonic Code that "no one can be compelled to give up his property, except for the public good and for a just and previous indemnity."

This, permit me to say, contemplates an ascertainment and a payment of compensation before the property is taken, and many State constitutions, my own included, provide that before the property is taken there must be ascertained and paid a just compensation for the same.

So universal is the recognition of this principle that in addition to its incorporation into our Federal Constitution there is probably not a State in the Union whose constitution does not embody it. It will not, therefore, be said that inserting this provision in the amendment established any new principle of law or justice, but, on the contrary, it was only recognizing in a constitutional form what had existed at common law and in equity for a very long time and had been an established principle of the civil law.

Referring to that class of cases in which property may be first taken on the part of the Government or for the Government without compensation having been made and referring to the same authority and quoting therefrom:

In Mitchel v. Harmony it was held:

"There are, without doubt, occasions in which private property may lawfully be taken possession of or destroyed to prevent it from falling into the hands of the public enemy and also where a military officer, charged with a particular duty, may impress private property into the public service or take it for public use. Unquestionably, in such cases, the Government is bound to make full compensation to the owner. The officer is not a trespasser. But in all these cases the danger must be immediate and impending or the necessity urgent for the public service, such as will not admit of delay and where the action of the civil authority would be too late in providing the means which the occasion calls for."

The cases cited do not fall within the class of cases provided for in section 13, there being no such immediate and impending necessity here as to require the taking of the property without some effort on the part of the authorities to ascertain what would be just compensation or the equivalent of the value of the use of the property by the Government. And yet, by the terms of this section, the rent administrator is given the power without qualification to take private property and fix rentals and determine conditions of tenancy as in his discretion he sees fit, and there is apparently no remedy.

So, Mr. President, I think section 13 as its stands, without any modification at all in regard to the compensation to be paid to the owner of the property for its use on the taking of it by the rent administrator, is unconstitutional and that it would be so held by a court having it under consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I understand the Senator bases the claim that it is unconstitutional on the ground that no provision is made for compensation, or does he base it on the ground that the property is not to be taken for a proper purpose?

Mr. STERLING. No; on the ground that there is no provision made for just compensation, as required by the Constitution. I am not disputing but that it might be taken for such a purpose, and that it would be a proper purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to get the Senator's idea. I listened to an argument yesterday where the Senator stated in effect he did not think the language implied the taking for a proper purpose.

Mr. STERLING. I recall that.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, I understand, concedes that the language of the bill would be constitutional if there were proper provision made in the bill applying to this section by which compensation in the meaning of the Constitution was provided for.

Mr. STERLING. I think so, taking the purposes of the bill generally and the purpose which is manifested in this one section.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to inquire of the Senator, if we have it narrowed down to that one proposition, does he not think the provisions of the bill applying to compensation, where it is provided that after the rent administrator fixes the price, anyone, indeed even including a mortgagee, has the right to apply for an appeal and can take it into court, would make it constitutional if they were applied by section 13?

Mr. STERLING. If they were made to apply to section 13, I think it probable that it would then be constitutional. There would be a way provided whereby just compensation could be ascertained.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, taking the Senator's own theory, it would require but a very slight amendment to section 13 to meet his objection, although I do not agree with the Senator that section 13 is so separate and distinct from the subject matter that the general provisions of the bill do not apply to it.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. HOLLIS. I have great respect for what the Senator from South Dakota said. We want this section constitutional and we do not want any doubt about it, because, in the first place, that is our intention, and, in the second place, if it is not constitutional it will be worthless. I will ask the Senator if, in his judgment, this amendment to the section would meet the case? Perhaps the amendment can not be accepted except by unanimous consent, because I understand the motion to strike out would be first in order. I suggest, in line 4, page 18, before the period, to insert:

Subject to appeal to the board of rent appeals and to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, as provided in section 9 of this act.

Mr. STERLING. That will materially improve the section; and it is just such an amendment as I intended to propose in the event the motion to strike out section 13 should not prevail.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator from New Hampshire where he proposes to apply that amendment to section 13?

Mr. HOLLIS. At the end of section 13, before the period.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, why does the Senator say he will have to wait until the motion to strike out is voted on? His amendment, as a parliamentary proposition, would take precedence over the motion to strike out, because it is proposed to perfect the text.

Mr. HOLLIS. The motion to strike out has already been made, and that motion, I think, would have to be voted on.

Mr. NORRIS. The motion to strike out has been made, but if the Senator makes a motion to perfect the matter which it is sought to strike out, there should first be a vote on that, because it is a proposition to perfect the matter proposed to be stricken out. Such a motion would certainly be in order, even though made after the motion to strike out.

Mr. HOLLIS. In order to avoid all difficulty, I ask unanimous consent, first, to perfect the section by inserting what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. STERLING. I would simply like to say at this point that my remarks have been made on the theory that the motion to strike out was the only motion in order, and that it could not be superseded by any other motion.

Mr. NORRIS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will kindly state it.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not in order, before a motion to strike out is voted on, to offer any motion to amend the language which it is sought to strike out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is of the opinion that when a motion to strike out has been made a motion to perfect the part proposed to be stricken out is in order.

Mr. NORRIS. And such a motion takes precedence?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It takes precedence.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there is no doubt about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] offers an amendment to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 18, line 4, after the word "discretion" and before the period, it is proposed to insert the following:

Subject to appeal to the board of rent appeals and to the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, as provided in section 9 of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to strike out section 13 as amended.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course, I favor the passage of this bill—it has become necessary—and I favor giving the President the power to take vacant and unoccupied houses or buildings. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] said when he was speaking that this is a provision to take vacant houses or buildings. Why not say so? This is burdened with conditions which are so framed, as I said the other day, that they might cause great injustice. It is no answer to that to say that injustice will not be done. We must pass laws under which injustice can not be done.

There is no use masquerading behind the President. Of course, we give this authority to the President, but we know the President is going to appoint a rent administrator, or whatever he is to be called, to deal with the subject. The President is not going about Washington looking for vacant houses and deciding whether or not he will take them and give them to clerks. It would be very wrong for him to do anything of the sort. The President is going to appoint some suitable and competent man to do this work. Necessarily, the houses that are unrented are mostly small and unimportant houses, but if they are vacant it is very reasonable to take them.

But what I object to is the extreme looseness with which this section is drawn, as to the periods of three months or five months. There is, as has already been pointed out, the danger that might occur from the operation of those conditions. On the other hand, a man fulfills the three months' condition or the five months' condition, and then can go away and leave his premises unoccupied indefinitely, and he has fulfilled one of the two conditions. Under this section, with the interpretations that have been placed upon it by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], actual occupation of the owner in whom the title is vested is necessary to relieve the property from being commandeered. If an officer goes to France and leaves his house here in possession of his wife and family, that house may be commandeered under this provision, because the owner in whom the title is is not resident there. That seems to be the interpretation given to it. I put the case yesterday of the occupation of a house by a family——

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. HOLLIS. I do not understand that that was agreed to by anyone. Certainly the occupation of a man's family is the occupation of the owner; or they are his tenants at will. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. LODGE. Yesterday I understood the Senator from New Hampshire to deny that precise proposition.

Mr. HOLLIS. I beg the Senator's pardon; there was no such intention. That is a matter which I have litigated in court several times. I know that the occupation by a man's family is occupation by him or that they are his tenants at will. There can be no doubt about that.

Mr. LODGE. What objection, then, can there be to saying "the owner or the owner's family"?

Mr. HOLLIS. I have no objection to inserting the words "or his family"; but it is absolutely unnecessary to do so.

Mr. LODGE. Where do you draw the line as to what constitutes a family?

Mr. HOLLIS. That will have to be left with the courts; we could not undertake to define that here.

Mr. LODGE. Exactly. A man has got to go into court to have defined whether or not the occupation is in accordance with the act. I suggested the insertion of the word "representative," but the Senator seemed to think that that would mean a caretaker. My own belief is that a furnished house occupied by any representative of the owner would be held to be the owner's occupation; but the language is entirely too loose, and different interpretations are given to it. If it could be better defined I should have no objection to it, and I should withdraw my motion to strike out the section if the words "owner or his representative" were inserted.

The periods of three months and five months, it seems to me, are more likely to lead to the easy evasion of the act than anything else; but if the committee is contented with those phrases or those conditions, of course I have no objection to make.

I want the authorities to have the power to take vacant houses, but I do not want them to have a power which could be easily abused and afford an opportunity for the exercise of favoritism or prejudice or hostility of a personal kind. It seems to me we ought to be able to give this authority, if it is necessary, in such a way as to do justice to the people who are unfortunate enough to own houses in Washington.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LODGE. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator from Massachusetts believe that the problem of the vacant houses in Washington is of the slightest importance?

Mr. LODGE. It is a perfectly insignificant thing. The houses that are now unrented are very few in number, perhaps 600 or 700, and most of them are very small. I believe that a considerable portion of that number are occupied by colored people. I think, from the figures that were read on yesterday, there are 240 which are occupied by colored people. They are not important houses; most of them probably would be of little use for the purposes of this bill.

This is merely one of those provisions, which if put in the bill, an incompetent administrator or a man with hostilities or favoritism could use to harrass people. That is the truth of it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] are perhaps more familiar with war legislation than am I, as the one is on the Naval Committee and the other is on the Military Affairs Committee; but may I ask, Is there not some legislation which already gives the President the power to commandeer any property that may be necessary for military purposes?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; he may commandeer all property. There is no limitation, no conditions about occupation or anything of that sort. The President may commandeer such property for military and naval purposes.

Mr. POMERENE. Then, if that be so, is it not a matter of slight moment whether or not this section is retained?

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me that the section is a needless one, as to the efficiency of the act; I have thought so all along, and as so many different opinions have been expressed about it on the floor, and as Senators in charge of the bill seem to interpret it in different ways, and, as I could not get it amended so as to make it, as it seems to me, safe for people who would be the subject of the legislation, I have moved to strike it out; but I think it could be made perfectly reasonable and perfectly safe, and retain the power which I should be very glad to grant to the proper authorities, to take genuinely vacant houses. There should be no difficulty, it seems to me, in deciding as to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am surprised to hear it stated that there are even five or six hundred vacant houses in the city of Washington—that is, houses that are fit for human habitation. I go about this city every day. Not long ago on whole rows of houses there were signs "For rent," but it is a rare thing to see such a sign now on any block in the city. If there are a few unoccupied houses that are fit for occupancy and the necessity is so great and the pressure so irresistible to provide quarters where men and women may lodge, why on earth are those houses not rented? It seems to me absolutely beyond comprehension that this condition can exist to any considerable extent, certainly to an extent that requires us to provide in the bill that houses may be commandeered. I wish that every Senator would go about the city as much as I do—and I am in the habit of doing that, having a very deep interest in the city of Washington and in the District of Columbia, and having served on the Committee on the District of Columbia for so long—and see how few signs for rent they can discover in an hour or two hours' ride about this District.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in connection with what the Senator from New Hampshire has said—I mentioned it yesterday, and I will mention it a little more fully to-day—when we were investigating the coal situation we had before us the fuel administrator of the District of Columbia. He was testifying as to the increased coal consumption in this city, and stated that a canvass of houses had been made to ascertain how many houses had been occupied which were not occupied the previous winter. It had been found that just before the outbreak of the war in the winter of 1917 there were some 5,500 houses in Washington unrented, whereas at the time he testified, which was last January, over 5,000 of them had been rented and that only a very few, about 500—he said he could not state the number with absolute accuracy, but about 500—remained unoccupied, and those undoubtedly were houses such as were described in the detailed figures which the Senator from New Hampshire gave, and included houses hopelessly out of repair and unfit for occupancy, houses in bad repair, and houses of a character which could not be used for the persons for whom it is desired to provide in this bill.

The section deals with a very trifling matter, which could easily be disregarded without in the least, I think, interfering with what we all desire to do in the bill; but the section would enable the rent administrator, if ill disposed—and such a person is conceivable—to harrass a great many people who are honest residents of Washington and who live here genuinely, but may go elsewhere for a few months in the summer or may be called away on business. There is no sense in harrassing or bothering those people about their houses; they are furnished houses; they are homes where people live.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has suggested that the fuel administrator said in his testimony that there were some 5,500 unoccupied houses of a certain kind some time prior to his testimony, and that at the time of his testimony there were between 500 and 600 of all kinds of houses many of them, beyond a doubt, not fit for tenancy.

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Since that time, if we have been properly informed, there probably has been an addition of 5,000 or 6,000 people to the population of the District; and, if those houses are unoccupied and are fit for occupancy the owners want, of course, to rent them. I see no reason why a single one of them should be unoccupied in the near future.

Mr. LODGE. I think we may rest assured that practically every rentable house in this city has been rented and that no one is holding back houses for the pleasure of keeping them vacant; the opportunity to rent them and to derive a good income from them is altogether too tempting to permit of their being held unoccupied. It is against the owner's interests to leave them vacant.

My objection, however, to this section is that it opens the door, as I have said, to harassing people who are genuine residents and have no idea of keeping their houses unoccupied or off the market, but who wish to live in them themselves. The same thing is equally true in regard to tenants. If what is meant by occupation could be made definite and clear in some way, I should have no objection to the section, although I think it is not an important one, except in that it may be abused. If an amendment could be agreed to providing that the section would not apply to houses occupied by representatives of the owners or members of their households, I should be very glad to cease any resistance that I have made to the measure; and I will suggest, as a perfecting amendment, to insert, after the word "tenant"—and this is different from the amendment I offered yesterday—the words "or the representatives of such owner or tenant," so that it will read:

That any vacant house or building not occupied by the owner or a tenant or the representatives of such owner or tenant——

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I make the point of order that that is the same amendment that was offered yesterday, inserting the word "representatives," as I recall, although I may be mistaken.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; it is an amendment offered at a different place, and the word "tenant" is added; it is a wholly different amendment.

Mr. HOLLIS. I make the point of order, and ask the ruling of the Chair, that, while it may not be inserted in the same place, it is the same amendment as that offered yesterday and inserted in a place where it will have exactly the same effect.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Chair to do me the kindness to hear my amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. First, the Chair would like to have the RECORD of yesterday read.

Mr. LODGE. My amendment yesterday was to insert, after the word "owner," the words "or representative of the owner." The amendment I offer to-day is to insert, after the word "tenant," the words "or the representatives of such owner or tenant."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire wish to be heard?

Mr. HOLLIS. No; I thought that it merely provided for the representatives of the owner; I did not understand that it included tenants.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from New Hampshire withdraws his point of order.

Mr. HOLLIS. I withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I am not particularly interested in the constitutional argument with reference to this section, but I am fundamentally opposed to the proposition. I spoke at length on the housing bill, and in the course of my remarks I devoted some little time to a discussion of the theory of government which, under the plea of war necessity, is being advanced from day to day in the legislative halls of this country. This, to my mind, is one of those attempts, made, of course, in good faith, to fasten a certain theory of government upon us under the plea of war necessity. However, it is not coordinated with the other attempts of the same character which have been made, some of which have been suggested.

We have already provided by law, in so far as this body could go, for the securing of all necessary houses for all workers engaged in any war occupation of any kind or character, not only throughout the United States generally, but in the city of Washington. In dealing with private dwellings the Senate engaged for some considerable time—one or two days—in the discussion of the proper methods to be adopted; and the original committee amendment, as well as the text of the bill, was amended in several different respects, and finally came out in approximately this form: The President was authorized to purchase, lease, requisition, or acquire, by condemnation or otherwise, any improved or unimproved land, or any right, title, or interest therein, on which such houses, buildings, improvements, and parts thereof have been or may be constructed, provided that with reference to private dwellings—this was placed in the bill by an amendment—and the furnishings of private dwellings, colleges, museums, and so forth, such dwellings should not be acquired except by contract with the owner or by semicondemnation proceedings. By amendment it was provided that in the attempt to take over an occupied private dwelling a certain procedure should be followed; in other words, that as a preliminary the President must present his reasons, the necessity for such taking over, before a judge of the district or circuit court in the district in which the house was situated, and must have the judgment of the judge upon the necessity. I opposed this legislation generally, and was opposed to the bill after the amendments were adopted.

Under section 13 of the act which is now under discussion, this particular section to which the amendment has just been offered by the Senator, there is no necessity whatsoever for the President making any representations to any person, a judge of a court, or anyone else, that there is any war necessity or any necessity for the taking over or commandeering of this house. There is a provision that he can not rent it except for war purposes. There is no provision whatsoever that he may take it over for war purposes; simply that he in his pleasure may take it over, commandeer it.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. FALL. Certainly.

Mr. HOLLIS. It is distinctly provided that the house may be commandeered by the President and used for war or Government purposes. I take it that would mean the same thing.

Mr. FALL. I will read the provision:

SEC. 13. That any house or building not occupied by the owner or a tenant for a period of three months immediately preceding the passage of this act, or for a period of five months after the passage of this act, may be commandeered by the President of the United States for the period of the war and six months thereafter——

Mr. HOLLIS. Will not the Senator read a little further?

Mr. FALL. Oh, I will read it.

Mr. HOLLIS. "And used for war or Government purposes."

Mr. FALL. I will be perfectly frank with the Senator. I am not in the habit of making consciously a special plea or quibble on a proposition of this kind; but I am pursuing the course of my argument logically as I see it, and I will state the matter with perfect fairness in so far as my limited ability will allow me to do so.

There is nothing requiring the President to make a statement to a judge or anyone else, such as is contained in the law already passed by this body with reference to an occupied dwelling. The preliminary before he can commandeer or take over an occupied dwelling, under the housing bill already passed, by which we have given $60,000,000 for the housing of all those engaged in any war necessity, whether in Washington or elsewhere, is that the President, before he takes over the house, must go before a district judge and must show that it is necessary for war purposes. Under this bill there is no necessity for doing that. The President himself simply says that this house has been vacant for three months or for five months, as the case may be, and that he takes it over. The bill imposes a limitation, to which the Senator has called my attention, that after so taking it over he can not use it except for war or Government purposes. That is the only limitation upon it. There is no prerequisites; there is nothing in the law itself to require that it shall be taken for war purposes, but simply that it shall have been vacant for a certain length of time. The President takes it over. Presumably, of course, the President himself, if he were able to act as his own real estate agent, would not take it over unless it were absolutely necessary for war purposes; but the point I am making is that after full discussion the Senate has seen fit to provide as to exactly this class of houses that they could not be taken over except upon a petition setting forth the necessity for war purposes, and then that the necessity must be passed upon by a judge and that there must be a hearing.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. FALL. I yield.

Mr. HOLLIS. Does not the Senator think there is a distinction between taking an occupied house and taking an unoccupied house?

Mr. FALL. The distinction is very plain, but it is not made in the two bills to which I refer, because I am speaking now of private dwellings furnished. The distinction which the Senator seeks to draw, to my mind, is one that he might urge in a question of tenancy or a question of ouster in legal proceedings, but not in a matter of legislation.

Mr. President, I have said that my objection to this was fundamental. I am one of those who have always believed, and yet do, in the old Anglo-Saxon doctrine which I have understood was at the very foundation of our boasted civilization, that a man's house is his castle, and that no great lord or king or potentate or power could violate the sanctity of the private dwelling of the humblest citizen of the United States or in any portion of the world where Anglo-Saxon civilization prevails. That is the foundation of my opposition to legislation along this line, authorizing or directing any power whatsoever or whomsoever to take over private dwellings unless for purely governmental purposes. For instance, if it is necessary to erect an arsenal or a Government work of some kind, and the only available site is occupied by private houses, then, of course, the private interest must give way to the public welfare; but in this case, as was so ably pointed out on yesterday by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and others, and, as is so apparent to me upon the face of it, there is such a vast distinction that it impresses me as one of those insidious attempts to fasten socialism upon this country under the plea of war necessity.

Many of us are in sympathy with many of the socialist doctrines. I frankly say that I am. We are all in sympathy with one of the matters that we are compelled to meet here and discuss from day to day—the welfare work, the uplift work. The majority of this Congress was in sympathy with the striking down of what had been recognized as State rights in the enactment or passage of such legislation as the child-labor law; and I am frank to say that under the principle of that legislation, for which I voted, if the Supreme Court of the United States finds that it is constitutional, in my judgment, to-morrow we can go into any State of the Union, to any private property whatsoever, and under the plea of the welfare of those engaged in work constituting any portion, directly or indirectly, of interstate commerce, we can take charge of the houses in which those workmen are compelled to live and we can see that they are constructed along the lines which would be insisted upon by Mr. Eidlitz or some one else. Possibly we may go to that extent; but if we do so, if we are going into this great uplift or welfare work to do away with State lines and our old theories of government here, then let us do so consciously and knowingly, and endeavor to guard ourselves against going to the other extreme, which is being preached by some of the men who are cooperating to-day apparently with these Salvation Army people who are continually singing about welfare in the legislative halls of the country.

Mr. President, it is only a step across an imaginary line, practically, from the ordinary socialist doctrine to the other form of socialism, which a great portion of the world, or at least 180,000,000 of the people of the world, are now confronting. Some socialists in this country have been preaching very recently the doctrine that to work out this welfare, uplift work to the benefit of mankind in general, it was absolutely necessary to overturn all forms of government, to overturn and revolutionize the entire world, and get rid of all that has been done during the last 6,000 years or more; that all the experience of past generations must be lost sight of in order to work out their objects.

I have here an extract from a speech made recently in New York at a semisocialistic meeting, in which one of the speakers, one Isaac Bainbridge, from Canada, stated their position; and I am frank to say that sometimes I am rather inclined to think that possibly some of the Senators here may be in sympathy, to some extent at least, with the statement:

We must destroy—

Said Mr. Isaac Bainbridge—

the very elements of the world's civilization before we can begin to revolutionize the world.

That is the position held by the Lenines and the Trotzkys of Russia. Who the Lenines and Trotzkys, or Lehhmans and Braunsteins, may be in our midst we might ascertain by looking with some little care into a list of some of those close around the administration, and the similarity of names is striking. In this country Lenine was Lehhman. In this country Trotzky was Braunstein. Now, whether we have Lenines and Trotzkys here remains to be seen; but if we go along a little further I am afraid that we are going to uncover some of them, and I am uneasy, I must admit, as to what the results may be, because there must be reconstruction after this war is over. I do not want to see fastened upon the people of this country without our knowing exactly what we are doing, and doing it consciously, with clear minds and after mature deliberation, socialism of the Lenine or Trotzky character under the plea of war necessity.

The very first stroke at civilization, the most vital blow which we can strike at the accumulated work of the world, is the unwarranted stroke at the private property of the individual. We have a Secretary of Labor who has announced publicly that the Government of the United States has the right to take private property simply because of the profits which it may be earning—not because of public necessity, not because of public welfare—but we have a Secretary of Labor who measures the governmental right to go into a man's private house, home, factory, or farm, and take his property by the amount of profit which he may be deriving from it. This has not been and can not be denied. This is one of the theories held by some of those or one of those close to the administration.

If we have any pride in our civilization as we have recognized it in our form of government as it has come down to us, we might at least hesitate and consult together before we go further along the lines which we have already been pursuing in fastening socialism upon this country and in striking at the very root of civilization itself as we have always known it—the sacred right of private property in the individual.

As I have said, Mr. President, this attempted legislation is not only not coordinated with that already adopted by the Congress in the housing bill, it is not only not attempted to be coordinated, but it is in direct conflict with it. In the one bill you provide that you can take an occupied dwelling by a plea first made of war necessity before taking it over, and then by showing the necessity for the taking of such property before a United States judge and having him acquiesce in such necessity. In this other case, the most insidious yet, in section 13 of this bill, all the law which you have already adopted, after consultation and consideration and action, is done away with, and in taking over such property, under the plea that he is only going to hold it during the term of the war and for six months thereafter, the President need not even say that it is for war purposes or because of any war necessity, but, as I have pointed out, he may only say that it has been vacant for three months prior to the passage of the act, or for five months after the passage of the act. It is true that he can not rent it unless he rents it ostensibly for war purposes. Of course, I do not mean to say that he would use a subterfuge, but he can not rent it unless it is rented for war purposes—to some one engaged in war work.

Mr. President, I am not speaking of the constitutionality of the measure now. That does not frighten me any more than did the constitutionality of the child-labor act. I am not one of those who think that we should all rally around the Constitution upon every occasion. But, in so far as the policy of this Government is concerned, I do plead with Senators here that we shall not pass one law to-day on one line and pass another law to-morrow overturning what we have done and adopting absolute socialism, such as the bolsheviki—with all due respect to my friend here, who seems to object to the term—such as the bolsheviki have established in Russia, where they recognize no right of ownership whatsoever in property of any kind or character.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NUGENT in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GRONNA. May I ask to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, line 22, after the word "tenant" insert the words "or the representative of the owner or tenant," so as to read:

That any vacant house or building not occupied by the owner or a tenant or the representative of the owner or tenant for a period of three months immediately preceding the passage of this act—

And so forth.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Did I understand the Secretary to read in line 21 the word "vacant"?

Mr. LODGE. That has been adopted already.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That word was inserted in line 21, the Secretary advises the Chair.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it not a contradiction of terms to say any vacant house not occupied? Why put in the words "not occupied" if we are going to put in the word "vacant"?

Mr. HOLLIS. We have been over that several times. The point raised by the Senator from Massachusetts was that it must be vacant at the time it was taken. One applies to the time at which it was taken and the other to the time preceding or succeeding the passage of the act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. HOLLIS. I call for a division.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. I withdraw the motion to strike out the section.

Mr. FALL. I give notice that I shall renew the motion to strike out section 13.

Mr. POMERENE. On page 13, line 3, after the words "and of," I move to insert the word "insurance," so as to read:

Repairs and maintenance actually incurred and of insurance, light, heat, water, and elevator, etc.

There is a comma to be inserted after the word "insurance."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to. It is agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, when the bill was under discussion a few days ago I ventured to suggest that among the offenders in the matter of so-called profiteering were men who came into the city of Washington and offered enormous rentals for private property, so high, indeed, that it was a suggestion, if not an encouragement, to the owners of property to advance their rentals. This morning a gentleman who owns, I think, two comparatively small apartment houses, who has not increased the rent at all, and who does not intend to do that, called my attention to the fact that apartments which he has let in his houses with a provision in the leases that they shall not be sublet without the consent of the owner has been disregarded absolutely, and men connected with the Government in one capacity and another have sublet those apartments, paying three or four times as much, and, I think, in one case five times as much as he receives from the tenant. He can not well enforce the provision that they shall not be sublet without his consent. The tenant moves out and another family moves in and takes possession.

In conversation with him I was impressed with the feeling that possibly we might remedy that in this bill, and I am going to suggest an amendment. I drafted it hurriedly, and likely it is not in good shape; but, as I said to the Senator from Ohio the other day, even if an amendment is not perhaps in the best form the conferees will have the power to correct it. As I said, I have hurriedly prepared an amendment that I think has merit in it, and I am going to submit it and ask the opinion of the Senator from Ohio about it. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of section 5, following the amendment to the amendment already agreed to, the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That any tenant who, in the opinion of the rent administrator, is charging exorbitant rents in subletting the premises or any part thereof occupied by him, either furnished or unfurnished, shall be deemed an undesirable tenant within the meaning of this section and shall be liable to forfeiture of his lease.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not know that I see any special objection to the amendment, except that I believe it is not necessary. In the first place, nearly all the leases in the District, as we were advised before the committee by the real estate brokers, who are familiar with the subject, contain a provision against subletting. If so, then the original lessor could take advantage of that fact, and if his conduct has been such as to amount in equity to a waiver of that particular provision, if the rents being charged by the tenant to the subtenant are in excess of the rate herein provided, the matter can be cared for by the rent administrator under the rules of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think the administrator would have full authority——

Mr. POMERENE. I have no doubt about it.

Mr. GALLINGER. To protect the owner of the property?

Mr. POMERENE. I am quite certain about that. At the same time, if the Senator prefers to have this amendment made so that the conferees may consider it further, I shall not offer any objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. I would like to have it go in with that understanding.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before it is passed on finally I should like to have it read again for the purpose of making a suggestion as to the closing sentence.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read again.

The Secretary again read the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask both Senators, as far as that is concerned, why it would not be far better to simply provide that the tenant subletting shall be governed by the same rules under the provisions of this bill as relate to the landlord?

Mr. POMERENE. The reason for that is this: In the earlier portion of the bill we speak of landlords and lessors or tenants. In one of the last sections of the bill you will find a definition of the words "landlord, lessor, and tenant" as embracing everyone who claims title under the original landlord. So the word "tenant" as used here includes the word "subtenant" as well.

Mr. McCUMBER. According to that argument the amendment would be unnecessary, because the tenant subletting is under the provisions of the bill governed by the same rule as the landlord.

Mr. POMERENE. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is all that could be asked.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to have the amendment go in for the consideration of the conferees. I think perhaps there is a little more to it than that.

Mr. POMERENE. With the understanding we have, I would not want it to seem that later, in the event there would be some objection to it, we would be guilty of any infringement of the conference rule by rejecting it.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; it could be struck out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. FALL. I move to strike out section 13.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico to the amendment of the committee to strike out section 13.

On a division the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to say that one of the Senators asked me a short time ago, in the event the bill came to its final passage, to have a roll call, and I feel, out of respect to his wish, that we should have a roll call.

Mr. HOLLIS. There is no reason why that should be done. No one has asked for it; and if asked for, probably the demand would not be seconded.

Mr. POMERENE. I have sent for the Senator to every place where I thought he might be, and I have not been able to find him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been declared passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill has been passed.

I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the necessity of amending the title.

Mr. POMERENE. That is the amendment the Senator suggested the other day that he was going to offer?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide further for the national security and defense by controlling and regulating rents of real estate in the District of Columbia."

Mr. POMERENE. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendment and that the Presiding Officer appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. DILLINGHAM, and Mr. JONES of Washington conferees on the part of the Senate.

REGISTRATION FOR MILITARY SERVICE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," and further insisting upon its amendments to the joint resolution and requesting a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move that the Senate further disagree to the amendments of the House, agree to the further conference asked for by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN conferees at the further conference on the part of the Senate.

LAND AT BOWDOIN, MONT.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 4154) granting to the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Bowdoin, Mont., for the benefit of the Methodist Episcopal Church, at Bowdoin, Mont., lots 12 and 13 in block 21, town site of Bowdoin, State of Montana. It is a bill which was reported yesterday by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], and it is a little bill affecting a couple of lots in this town in Montana. I objected to the consideration of it yesterday, because I thought it would be used as a handle to hang on a long argument upon another subject. It seems to be very close to the heart of the Senator from Montana, and it certainly can be passed, although he is absent at the present time, in just a minute. As I was responsible for not having it considered yesterday, I ask unanimous consent that it may be put on its passage at this time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with an amendment, on page 1, line 4, after the word "patent," to insert "upon the payment of the appraised price thereof," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to convey by patent upon the payment of the appraised price thereof lots 12 and 13, in block 21, town site of Bowdoin, State of Montana, to the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Bowdoin, Mont., to be held by them, their successors and assigns forever, for the use and benefit of the Methodist Episcopal Church, at Bowdoin, Mont., said property to be used by said church for religious purposes in the town and State aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hollis	New	Smoot
Beckham	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Sutherland
Borah	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Overman	Tillman
Colt	Kenyon	Page	Townsend
Culberson	King	Phelan	Trammell
Curtis	Kirby	Poindexter	Underwood
Fernald	Knox	Pomerene	Vardaman
Fletcher	Lenroot	Robinson	Wadsworth
Gallinger	Lewis	Shafroth	Walsh
Gronna	Lodge	Sheppard	Watson
Hale	McCumber	Shields	Weeks
Hardwick	McKellar	Smith, Md.	Wilfley
Henderson	Nelson	Smith, Mich.	Williams

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KIRBY in the chair). Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I do not feel inclined to ask the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business to-day. The clerk of the committee is absent, and he has amendments we have prepared, data, and so forth. I ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside, and give notice that on Monday morning I shall ask the Senate to resume its consideration, and it is my purpose to keep the bill before the Senate until it is passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, March 13, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 11, 1918.

The House was called to order at 12 o'clock noon by Mr. KITCHIN, as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we lift up our hearts in gratitude to Thee for all the manifestations of Thy love displayed in the works Thou hast wrought—the sunshine and the rain, the day and night, the change of seasons, seedtime and harvest, the wonderful faculties of mind and soul bestowed upon us; for home and all that makes it dear; especially for the mother love, the purest, sweetest, fullest reflection of Thy love.

We thank Thee that by common consent a day has been set apart in her memory, that her children may pour out their affections for her and express their gratitude for her loving service to them.

It was mother who went down into the valley of death that they might live. She it was who succored them, comforted them in sorrow, and taught them the larger life. No sacrifice seemed too great in the solicitude, care, and love she poured out for them.

Especially do we pray for the mothers who have given their sons in the terrible crisis which has been thrust upon the world. Be with them, uphold and sustain them in their anxiety and loneliness, her sacrifice on the altar of liberty.

May the mails bring millions of letters from abroad to cheer and comfort her in the Name of Him who died that we might know Thy love in all its fullness. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. 11245) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and an act in amendment thereto, approved October 6, 1917.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

An act (S. 3900) to amend section 5172 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 155) providing for the filling of a vacancy which will occur July 2, 1918, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8696) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

The message also announced that the Senate had further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. HITCHCOCK, and Mr. WARREN as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of spies and alien enemies.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask the gentleman if these are his own remarks?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I want to put in two or three lines of a petition from some constituents, and follow it with my own remarks.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. With the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; with my own remarks.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to say a word—and it has no application to the gentleman's request at all—but during the last few days quite a number of outside addresses have been slipping into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I think, to a certain extent, the privilege has been abused.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I know the gentleman will acquit me of anything of that sort.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I say this has no reference whatever to the request of the gentleman from Florida. It has a general application.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I have been here about 14 years, and during my service I have never abused that privilege yet.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Speeches made by entire strangers to Congress have been circulated as if printed in the RECORD. The purpose is to have them sent through the mails free. Of course, the gentleman from Florida would not sanction anything of that kind, and this has no reference to him. I am only taking advantage of his request, to which I do not object, to give notice that some of us will watch the situation a little more attentively in the future.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Florida what is the nature of his remarks?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I stated that I wanted to extend my remarks on the subject of spies and alien enemies in this country who are plotting the destruction of this country.

Mr. BARNHART. Is it the gentleman's own production?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. All but about four lines.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a short editorial on the life and public services of a former Representative in this House, Hon. Edward C. Kehr.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting an editorial as indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. I object.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to speak for three minutes.

Mr. DYER. I have never known a request of that kind to be denied heretofore. This gentleman was a former Member of this House.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Missouri may be given three minutes in which to address the House.

Mr. BARNHART. I do not wish to withdraw my objection, because I uniformly object to the insertion of editorials in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. If the gentleman wants a few minutes in which to read his editorial, I have no objection.

Mr. DYER. This is an editorial on the life and character of a former Member of this House.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present and the gentleman from Texas moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two hundred and seventy-seven Members, a quorum, have answered to their names.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. MASON] went to New York on Thursday to visit his son, who is a volunteer in the United States Army, and who will sail for France in a few days. My colleague asked me at that time to request leave of absence for him, but I neglected to do so. I make that request now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SINNOTT for three days, on account of illness in his family.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS—WAR-RISK INSURANCE BUREAU.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the War-Risk Insurance Bureau, with a letter from Mr. De Lanoy relating to the work of that bureau.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau and to insert a letter. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did not understand the name of the writer of the letter.

Mr. STERLING of Illinois. Mr. De Lanoy, the Director of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

TREASURY BALANCE ON APRIL 1, 1918.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a privileged resolution which I sent to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 345.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to report to the House the amount of the Treasury balance on the 1st day of April, 1918, where the same is on deposit, and the rate of interest being received from each depository.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which has just been read. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, has the gentleman sought this information from the Treasury Department by letter or otherwise?

Mr. MADDEN. No; I have not.

Mr. GARNER. This resolution has not had the consideration of any committee?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. GARNER. I wish the gentleman would let it go over until Monday.

Mr. MADDEN. All right. I am perfectly willing to have it go over until Monday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his request for the present.

MANUFACTURE OF GOVERNMENT SUPPLIES AT ATLANTA PENITENTIARY.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 8938.

Mr. WALSH. The House resolves itself automatically.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 8938, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8938) to equip the United States Penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., for the manufacture of supplies for the use of the Government, for the compensation of prisoners for their labor, and for other purposes, with Mr. RUBEY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose yesterday the Clerk had finished the reading of section 2, to which there is a committee amendment. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, strike out all of the matter between lines 18 and 25, inclusive.

The matter proposed to be stricken out is as follows:

SEC. 2. That from and after July 1, 1918, articles so manufactured shall not be purchased from any source other than governmental for the United States Government, or any department, bureau, or other agency thereof, unless the Attorney General or his authorized agent shall certify that the same can not be furnished by such prison factory or factories, and no claim shall be audited or paid without such certificate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That articles so manufactured shall be sold at the current market prices as determined by the Attorney General or his authorized agent, and all moneys or reimbursements received from such sales shall be deposited to the credit of the working capital fund created by this act.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 5, after the word "act," insert the words "and no raw material entering into such manufactured articles shall be purchased at more than current market prices."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to stir my friends from the cotton-growing States, but if a suggestion that this might affect prices in the South will attract the attention of the gentlemen on the other side, I will suggest that this might involve a cotton price-fixing proposition. Section 2 of the bill gives to the Attorney General or his authorized agents the power to sell the products of the convict laborers in the Atlanta Penitentiary at current market prices. Presumably those friends of the labor movement in the House, who have spoken in favor of convict labor as herein proposed, may see a saving clause in this section which provides that the goods made by the convicts shall not be sold at less than current market prices. That may suit them. It may suit those even who are competitors of the convict-labor system which this bill authorizes; but I question whether the omission of the amendment which I have suggested will satisfy purchasers of cotton in other sections than the vicinity of the Atlanta Penitentiary who have to enter into competition with the convict labor in this penitentiary. I am sure they will not be satisfied unless it is provided by law that the Government shall not pay higher prices or different prices for the raw cotton used for manufacturing purposes in the Atlanta Penitentiary than free manufacturers have to pay. It is possible there may be a snake in this section as written; I do not know; but I call the attention of representatives of cotton-manufacturing districts that it may be within the power of the Government to fix cotton prices under this provision. It may be that if the Government decides to buy raw cotton at 30 cents a pound for the purposes of the Atlanta Penitentiary, in order that convicts may be employed, that every cotton operator outside of the Atlanta Penitentiary would be obliged to pay the same price for all raw material. It may be that such an influence would be brought to bear to lower the price for raw materials entering into cotton manufacture.

If the amendment I have offered is adopted the cotton manufactures made by convicts in Atlanta shall not be sold at less than the prevailing market price thereof, and the raw material purchased by the Government for the use of the Atlanta Penitentiary shall not be bought at more than the prevailing market prices. What is fair in one instance is fair in another. Let us put them on an equality since you are putting free labor in competition with convict labor. I do not see how the proponents of this bill can object to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word in opposition to the amendment. In the first place, the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is entirely useless, because the bill is so framed as to prohibit the sale of this product except to the Government of the United States, and this clause is put in the bill as a matter of bookkeeping to enable the Attorney General to determine whether the institution is making money or losing money. In order to do that we provide that current prices shall be allowed for the duck.

Now, as to the gentleman's solicitude about the price of cotton; that is wasted, because there is no provision in the bill for machinery to spin the yarn, and hence no cotton can be bought. Privately owned mills will spin the cotton into yarn, and then the Government will buy the yarn from such mills and weave it into duck in the prison factory. They are not going to buy raw cotton at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania), there were—24 ayes and 67 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 2, strike out the words "the current market," and the word "as" and insert the words "to be," so as to read "prices to be determined."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in order to give the Attorney General a wider latitude in fixing prices for these products. It seems to me that if the Government is going into the manufacture of cotton duck, producing it with convict labor, and the Government is going to be the only customer, that the Government ought not to pay excessive prices for a product produced by itself. The Attorney General ought to have the discretion of fixing it at the lowest market price in view of the great need there may be for the product. While it might liven up a little the competition between the plants and private mills, I do not think, in order to facilitate the bookkeeping and making a creditable showing, that the Attorney General ought to be compelled to fix prices at the current price for a particular product, because no matter how many men they employ, or how many machines they have, or the amount of product that they will turn out in this penitentiary, it will not be up to the standard of that turned out by private concerns, and the Attorney General ought not to be compelled to fix prices for an inferior product at the price of better goods provided by private individuals.

Mr. WEBB. I am afraid if the gentleman's amendment is adopted it will allow the Attorney General to do just what the gentleman from Massachusetts does not want him to do; and that is, let him fix any price he pleases for an inferior article.

Mr. WALSH. There is no current price for an inferior product.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, yes; there is.

Mr. WALSH. There is not in textile goods.

Mr. WEBB. We ought to require him to figure on current prices so that Congress will know if it is making or losing money. If you give him the power to fix any price he pleases he can make it appear that the institution is making big money, or that it is losing money. I think the current price is important for the benefit of Congress to see whether we are making or losing.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the Attorney General is going to be responsible for the operation of this plant. We are going to put the responsibility on him for the conduct of this cotton manufacture, and we ought to give him discretion with reference to the fixing of prices.

It is not as though we had to fix these prices in order to show a profit or so that we can pay these convicts the eight-hour wage that is paid in private establishments, because if they strike down there and will not work unless they get the wage that is paid in private institutions, they will find a way of making them work, I assume, and we ought not to tie him up to one standard of prices simply because we want to facilitate the factory or because we want to preserve intact this working fund which is appropriated here. If they make a superior product, we ought to let him fix the price so they may pay a little bonus, or we ought to fix it so that if they make an inferior product he can sell to the Government at a little less rate.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Where is any provision in the bill allowing the Attorney General in his discretion to sell any of these manufactured products?

Mr. WALSH. Sold to the Government.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Sold to the Government? The Government appropriated the money and owns the machinery.

Mr. WALSH. We adopted an amendment here yesterday providing it should be sold to the Government. We adopted an amendment the effect of which was to make the Government the only customer for the product of this cotton manufactory at the Atlanta Penitentiary.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, Mr. Chairman, then I want to ask the gentleman another question. If he will turn to page 2, line 14, he will see it says:

The products of any such agricultural developments shall be utilized in supplying such correctional institutions as the Attorney General may designate, or, in his discretion, may be sold.

Now, the language to which the gentleman is referring, on top of page 3, is this:

The articles so manufactured shall be sold at the current market prices as determined by the Attorney General—

And so forth. The language on page 2, to which I have directed attention, referred to the products of agricultural development. These are not manufactured products——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now, I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] where there is any provision in the bill regulating the price for agricultural products to be raised there?

Mr. WALSH. There is no provision in the bill applying to agricultural products.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And where is there any provision by which the Attorney General, in his discretion, can sell the manufactured cotton products?

Mr. WALSH. That was done by amendment in line 6, I think, on page 2, on yesterday.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If the gentleman will permit, an amendment was offered by Mr. FRENCH on page 2, line 6, after the word "shop," to strike out the period and insert a comma and the words "and the articles so manufactured shall be sold only to the Government of the United States." That is the amendment which was adopted.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing further to add, except it seems to me, if we are going to impose this responsibility for the conduct of this institution on the Attorney General, that we can give him this discretion as to fixing prices and not tie him down to current prices for cotton duck of a certain weight or a certain kind when in this institution they might make something entirely different, and then, of course, there would not be any current market prices for it. Certainly it can do no harm to show our confidence in the Attorney General, whoever he may be, to fix these prices. He has got to sell them to the Government anyhow.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. WEBB. I think it would be bad business to allow one man to fix any prices for a product made at a Government plant, when we ought to know whether the plant is or is not making or losing money.

Mr. WALSH. Would it be any worse business than for Congress to try and fix the prices on other products?

Mr. WEBB. That may be, but there are current prices for first and seconds and everything of the kind practically in the textile business, and current prices are those that regulate it throughout the country, and I do not think we are justified in disturbing——

Mr. WALSH. Does not the gentleman think the Attorney General might fix the prices on this product as well as the President should fix the price on wheat? There one man fixes the price.

Mr. WEBB. This is a question of good business for the Government itself, and we do not want to give——

Mr. WALSH. I do not think it is good business.

Mr. WEBB. It certainly is good business to keep the Congress informed about the financial success or failure of the institution.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing further to say except to await action on this amendment.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question. The Government of the United States runs and operates powder plants, manufactures powder, and it owns and operates some plants for the manufacture of shells. This is a war measure. I do not think that a Government powder plant is required to sell its output at the market value. The purpose of establishing a powder plant by the Government was to reduce the price of powder, and as a result it did reduce the price of powder to the Government from $1.25 to 53 cents per pound. Now, I think that one of the best features of this bill is that when it is in operation that in these days of high frenzied finance and profiteering it would be a wholesome means of holding down the price of those plants that are perhaps engaged in a similar business and that are asking extortionate prices for their output, and it occurs to me, instead of the Government having to market its output at the market value, whatever that would be, I do not know what the price of this ducking is on the market now—if it has moved as other commodities have moved, it is two or three hundred per cent higher than it was in peace times—but if this plant is to be serviceable at all to the Government, the best feature in the bill, from my comprehension of it, would be as a lever to hold down the prices of these individuals or private plants that are asking extortionate prices for their goods.

Mr. REAVIS. What is the answer of the gentleman to that?

Mr. WEBB. My answer is, first, that this is an experimental proposition, as has been shown and recommended by this distinguished commission, and the Congress ought to be informed whether or not as an institution it is making money or losing money; and when the Army or the Navy or the Shipping Board or the Post Office Department buys this product the penitentiary gets the current prices, so that we know how much these departments use and what the product is worth at current prices.

Mr. HELM. How does it operate its powder plant? It owns the plant and employs the labor, and it certainly ought to know whether it is losing or making money, and it seems to me they might apply the same business method to this kind of a plant as it does to the powder plant.

Mr. WEBB. The powder plant has gone beyond the experimental stage.

Mr. HELM. It did experiment with it, and by reason of that they reduced the price of powder from 80 cents to 50 cents.

Mr. WEBB. But it is proposed here that out of the 400 men to employ only 250 to 400. And one of the best ways to find out the cost is to have the institution given credit at the current market price.

Mr. FESS. Would the gentleman object to striking out that section?

Mr. WEBB. The section entirely?

Mr. FESS. Yes. All of this product is intended for the Government. It is either for the Army or Navy or the Shipping Board or the Post Office Department, specifically designated in section 1. Now, why should we write something in the bill to indicate we are making things for the Government to sell in the open market for somebody and not for the Government. In the first place, it is the Government making them, and if they are made for the Government and sold to the Government the Government would be both the maker and seller and buyer.

Mr. WEBB. Absolutely. It is just a question of bookkeeping for the information of Congress. The only institution that can get a yard of this cloth is the Government of the United States, to be used by the Army or Navy or the Post Office Department.

Mr. FESS. But according to this you can sell it in the open market.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEBB. If the Congress desires to throw the thing wide open and be almost unable in the future to tell whether this institution is making or losing money, we might strike out this section. But this section is inserted in the bill in order to furnish information from year to year to the Congress and to the public.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The current market price includes a profit to the owners of stock, does it not?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What the Government is interested in is finding out what its actual outlay is, and without any regard to dividends.

Mr. WEBB. Precisely.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then, why do you say "current market price" if the Government is not in it to make money for itself? It is in it to make money regardless of outside manufactories.

Mr. WEBB. The Government ought not to lose money on the institution if it can be made self-sustaining, but we certainly should know at the end of each year how this is, whether it is losing or making money.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If a man invests all his money in an establishment, and owns it all, pays the labor and buys the material, and uses it all himself, he does not sell it to anybody.

Mr. WEBB. No; he does not. As I said before, my understanding is that the object of the section was for the purpose of keeping the books so that the Congress could find out whether the Government at current prices was making or losing money.

Mr. REAVIS. How can the Government purchase something that it already owns?

Mr. WEBB. Very easily—that is, the departments of the Government can do so. I think they do it every day.

Mr. REAVIS. If the Government is still owner of the product, how can it purchase its own product?

Mr. WEBB. One department can sell to another if we provide that it be done, and the purchase price charged to the appropriation set aside for these departments.

Mr. REAVIS. Does not the amendment of yesterday, making the Government the sole purchaser and user and sole owner of the product, make section 3 unnecessary?

Mr. FESS. That amendment adopted yesterday was totally unnecessary. It did not change the wording of the law.

I would like to ask the chairman if the striking out of section 2, which would have permitted the sale in the open market, does not make section 3 entirely useless?

Mr. WEBB. Section 3?

Mr. FESS. Yes; we struck out section 2.

Mr. WEBB. Section 3 provides for paying the inmates some sort of wages.

Mr. FESS. I mean section 3 of the old bill.

Mr. WEBB. I do not think I caught the gentleman's question.

Mr. FESS. Section 2, that the committee struck out, would indicate that the Government was to have the monopoly in the manufacture of this article, and would carry with it the inference that it could sell in the open market. By striking that out does not it make the next section entirely useless?

Mr. WEBB. I can not understand it that way, I will say to my good friend. My idea all along has been that this section 3 was put in for the purpose of giving Congress the information as to whether or not at current prices this institution is a losing or a gainful business.

Mr. FESS. Then it does not carry the idea which my friend from Kentucky [Mr. HELM] has, that the Government is going to sell in a market that is competitive, so as to keep the price of an article down?

Mr. WEBB. No; it does not carry that idea.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. My colleague on the committee asked me a question first. Then I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if at current prices this business proves to be a losing venture, will the Government continue it? Is that the idea?

Mr. WEBB. It will give the Government information upon which it can act when it comes to consider its plans for the further conduct of the institution.

Mr. WALSH. And disregard the humanitarian purposes for which it is proposed to be established, because the Government is losing money?

Mr. WEBB. Is it not advisable for the Government to determine whether it is losing or making money?

Mr. WALSH. I do not think it is important whether the Government is losing money or making money, but the Government has it in its control and has a working capital, if it is keeping that working capital intact.

Mr. WEBB. You can find out whether at current prices this business is losing or making money.

Mr. WALSH. If the Attorney General fixes the prices as he sees fit, we can get the same information from him.

Mr. WEBB. He might make it appear, if you gave him the power, as though it were a paying proposition when it might be a losing proposition.

Mr. WALSH. We have not that kind of an Attorney General, have we?

Mr. WEBB. I did not say he would do so; but I was speaking of the power you propose to give.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. WINSLOW. I would like to ask the gentleman whether in the hearings a statement has been produced as to the number of looms now in this country which are available and which could be turned about and put to weaving this duck?

Mr. WEBB. I do not think so; at least, I have not heard it. I know, at least, that a member of the Council of National Defense stated that a great many carpet manufacturers had converted their looms so as to make this very heavy duck.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts would destroy the harmony and the whole theory upon which this bill is framed. It is the idea of this bill to form a corporation in a way, so far as bookkeeping is concerned, and to keep an account of the products that are manufactured and sold, just as any outside agency would. It is proposed in this bill for the Government to manufacture supplies not only for the Army and the Navy, but for the Post Office Department. At the present time different departments of the Government are purchasing supplies needed for their respective departments from other bureaus of the Government. I need only cite one instance, that of the Post Office Department, in securing its supplies of post cards from the Government Printing Office. The Government Printing Office has a certain appropriation for carrying on its work. The Post Office Department has another appropriation for carrying on its work. The Post Office Department advertises for bids for the supply of post cards. Post card bids are submitted from outside sources and also from Government sources. In the last bidding the Post Office Department selected the bid of the Government Printing Office. When the Post Office Department secures its supplies of post cards, true, it is a bookkeeping arrangement in a way, but nevertheless it goes through the same method of payment for these supplies as if it were paying for them to a private contractor, and that is necessary in order to keep the business accounts of the respective departments of the Government, the Government Printing Office and the Post Office Department, separate and distinct.

More than twelve or fourteen years ago, when I first began service on the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, we were purchasing our mail bags, which it is proposed here to manufacture at the Atlanta Penitentiary, from a private contractor, who had them manufactured by convict labor. That was later, by an act, forbidden, because we did not believe it was right for the National Government to secure the manufacture of any article it needed by convict labor through a private contractor. Now we propose to have those bags, that are manufactured by private manufacturers, manufactured at the penitentiary at Atlanta. The Post Office Department in the Post Office appropriation bill has a certain amount of money for the purchase of mail bags, running into the neighborhood of three or four hundred thousand dollars. A few years ago it was $400,000. I believe it is now between three and four hundred thousand. The department will purchase these bags manufactured at the Atlanta Penitentiary from this Government agency at the market prices. That penitentiary will be credited with that amount in its working capital, in order to purchase the raw cotton necessary to make the bags and also to pay the convicts directly, or to their families, for the work performed on the bags.

It is proposed that that method of keeping account of the transactions between the respective establishments should be followed, as it has been heretofore. It is a question of bookkeeping and accounting, so that we can go on in the orderly method pursued in the past, so that we can keep account of the expenses and operation of this plant.

Mr. WALSH. I am surprised that the gentleman would say that the Government prints post cards down at the Government Printing Office. I suppose he meant governmental postal cards.

Mr. STAFFORD. Everybody but the gentleman from Massachusetts would know what I meant.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is always so accurate and keen in his statements that I wanted to call his attention to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not comparable to the gentleman from Cape Cod.

Mr. WALSH. When the Government Printing Office is engaged in the manufacture of post cards, how many other manufacturers in the country are engaged in that same business?

Mr. STAFFORD. None at all.

Mr. WALSH. That is so; but in this case how many hundreds of manufacturers will be engaged in the manufacture of cotton duck?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. The War and Navy Departments will have a certain fund at their disposal for the purchase of duck. True, this penitentiary will not be equipped to supply all that is necessary for the War and Navy Departments, but the departments will pay to this manufacturing corporation, on paper, it is true, the market prices for this duck, as they do to private manufacturers, and it will be credited on the books of the corporation as working capital, in order that they may continue this corporation as a going concern, without coming every year to Congress and asking for an appropriation for that purpose. This bill is founded on good business principles and good governmental principles, as well, and I do not think the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, who is not acquainted with the business practices of the Government in the various departments, should be supported.

Mr. WALSH. He is acquainted with the business practices of the Post Office Department.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This is not planned to save any money for anyone, is it?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, this bill has been attacked in this House by Representatives who believe they should conserve the interests of the private manufacturers and not give consideration first to the humanitarian side, to the welfare of the convicts.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman name them?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the Massachusetts regency has been here in force.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. STAFFORD. The distinguished gentleman who now asks me to yield to him, who years ago was at the head of the prison in Massachusetts, before they had the modern idea of paying convicts their just compensation for the work they perform, as this bill proposes to do, argued in opposition to this bill.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Convicts are unchanged. I know them well.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Wisconsin be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman argued against this bill on the ground that you could not get convicts to work.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. You can not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, out in my State and in the States of North Dakota and Minnesota we have no difficulty whatsoever in having convicts employed in gainful occupations, in the manufacture of binding twine. Another gentleman from Massachusetts, the honorable and ancient JOHN JACOB, comes here and says, "Yes; I am in favor of the humanitarian policy"——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is a respectful way to refer to one of my colleagues. I ask the gentleman to modify his language.

Mr. STAFFORD. JOHN JACOB ROGERS, the gentleman from Massachusetts. I certainly did not intend to describe him as John Jacob Astor, because we all know he is not comparable to the distinguished Astor family, whose progenitor bore the name of John Jacob. He says he believes in the humanitarian principle of keeping convicts employed, but he believes they should be employed only in matters that are needed for their own welfare, when everyone knows that it is absolutely impracticable to keep convicts employed in the manufacture of their own necessities.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. STAFFORD. Not just at present. Another gentleman from Massachusetts—not to offend the sensibilities of the gentleman from the Cape Cod district——

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has apparently driven him from the floor.

Mr. STAFFORD. He claims that there is no reason for this bill because there are plenty of manufacturers to supply the necessities of the Government for duck. No one has justified this bill on the ground that there are not plenty of manufacturers at present to supply the necessary requirements. This bill had its genesis two years ago when the Committee on Appropriations felt the necessity of trying to find some employment for Federal convicts. A commission was appointed, and that commission has made its report, and that report is to the effect that we do need, in times of peace and in times of war, certain cotton fabrics, namely, duck for the Army and Navy and mail bags for the Postal Service, and that we should go ahead with the execution of this plan. The last Congress provided an appropriation for the building at Atlanta. After that the question is purely whether we shall go ahead with that policy, having the buildings erected, even though it may take some time to obtain the looms; whether we should allow the buildings to remain vacant, or whether we should go ahead with this humanitarian and utilitarian policy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This war measure!

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no one has claimed it is a war measure except the enemies of the bill. They have been the only ones who have emphasized that phase of it. There has been no pretense here that it is a war measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I ask that the gentleman may have time enough for me to ask him if he includes me among the Members who he says have spoken in behalf of the manufacturers in their district.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I do not.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I do not know what the gentleman means.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. With the quarrel between the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] and the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] I have no concern whatever. Many arguments have been advanced to support this bill. I join with every Member of the House who placed necessity of its passage on the humanitarian side of life. A man who is confined in a penitentiary is a human being after all, and it is the hope of all that to a certain extent a large number of them may be reclaimed. But I do not care so very much about that, because from my viewpoint I think it is not the controlling element that induces me to vote for it. I am not much in favor of the Government going into the general manufacturing business; I am to a certain extent in favor of the Government partially going into the manufacture of the material to supply particular branches of the Government.

Less than 20 years ago the Navy and the War Departments were paying $1.23 a pound for their smokeless powder. About 16 years ago Congress made a little appropriation of $250,000 for the establishment of a powder plant down here on the Potomac River. Within six months after Congress made that appropriation, and before the Government had made a single pound of powder, the price dropped from $1.23 to 80 cents a pound. From time to time Congress continued to make appropriation to enlarge the plant until a few years ago the Du Pont people, who had a complete monoply of the manufacture of all the powder in the United States, were perfectly willing to come here and enter into an agreement with the Government to sell powder to the Government at 53 cents a pound. The argument has been made here time and again that the Government can not make things as cheaply as private individuals can make them. Granting that to be true, by the Government being in certain lines of manufacture it has compelled private interests to reduce the price of their finished commodity. Now, if that is true of powder, if it is true of small arms, that private manufacturers cut their price to the Government from 25 to 33⅓ per cent, is it fair and reasonable to assume that if the Government goes into the manufacture of this kind of material we will see a reduction in the price of duck and cotton bagging and things of that kind which the Government must buy.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will permit, it says, in section 2, "that articles so manufactured shall be sold at the current market prices."

Mr. COX. That make no difference at all. We will get a record for the first time in the United States of what cotton duck can be manufactured for.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; because you will have it done by prison labor.

Mr. COX. Because down to this time the Government has never entered on this line of manufacture. It has entered on the line of the manufacture of powder and small arms, and, to a large extent, in the manufacture of cannon. When this plant once gets into operation, when it gets to going, the Government will begin to get a line quick and fast upon what this material can actually be made and manufactured for, and if it costs the Government more to manufacture than it does a private individual, the Government will be in a position to learn for the first time in its existence whether it has been overcharged by private manufacturers in this line of work. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts to strike out the current price ought not to prevail. True, it will be nothing in the world but a question of bookkeeping, but it will tell the country exactly what it can be manufactured for. That will give the Army and the Navy and the users of this kind of material the opportunity, and the first opportunity they have had, to know whether or not heretofore they have been overcharged for this material.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. For a question.

Mr. FESS. If the purpose of the bill is to bind the market so as not to allow some article manufactured by private enterprise to sell at a higher rate, you have the question of labor enter into it, because you are putting your convict labor in competition with free labor outside. If you do that, you ought to pay the convicts the same price as free labor is paid, and work them the same length of time. I confess that that is not my view of this bill at all.

Mr. COX. I am sorry the gentleman from Ohio does not agree with me. We are told everywhere, and everybody is making a speech about profiteering. I thoroughly join in the view that this is no time for profiteering. If the manufacturers have and are profiteering by overcharging the Government, they belong to that class of profiteers which deserve censure, and neither you nor I nor any other person will ever know whether they are overcharging until we get the plant in operation and see what it could be manufactured for. You will never know what it can be manufactured for unless the Attorney General of the United States is given the right to fix the price of cotton duck made in the penitentiary at the current market prices.

For eight years I was a member of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee. I know it has been a serious and vital question in that committee that the manufacturers of cotton mail bags have overcharged the Post Office Department, and yet the department has no way of determining exactly what is a fair and reasonable profit for manufacturing and making that kind of goods, because the Government has no plant in operation to manufacture cotton-bagging goods.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended one minute in order to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. There is something in what the gentleman says, but the Government has the power now to take over any plant or manufacturing institution that is established, that has the machinery, and find out what it will cost to make these articles.

Mr. COX. Yes; but I imagine that neither the gentleman from Iowa nor anyone else would be willing for the Government to commandeer the spindles and looms of these mills and employ convict labor therein.

Mr. GOOD. What would be more fair, to take one plant with the force there employed and manufacture duck, rather than to erect a new plant and put convicts at work in manufacturing the article?

Mr. COX. It is not a question with me to-day as to being fair or unfair. It is a question of getting the cotton duck that is so much needed by the Army and the Navy, and second, the only way to get at it quickly is to see what that stuff can actually be made and manufactured for by the Government. This may not be a full and fair test of the cost of manufacture of cotton duck and canvas, but it will be an approximation of the cost. It will be enough to show the Government whether it is now overcharged by private manufacturers for this kind of material.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section be now closed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the section.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I intended to make that motion at the proper time.

Mr. COX. Is that a proper motion until the amendment is disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were—ayes 12, noes 34.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the defeat of the amendments that have been offered leaves the bill now so that the Attorney General or his agent can buy or sell substantially as he pleases. He may not sell the product of the convict labor of the Atlanta Penitentiary at less than the prevailing market prices, which to a certain extent would tend to protect outside free labor, but he is permitted to buy the raw material at any price he sees fit; and if he turns the work over, as he undoubtedly will, to some skillful cotton manufacturer or to some skillful cotton manipulator who knows more about the business of disposing of raw cotton and fixing market prices than he does, it may be that the Atlanta Penitentiary, where convict labor is to be employed in competition with free labor outside, may be used for the purpose of bolstering up the price of cotton or of bearing the price down.

I can not agree with some of the suggestions thrown out by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Cox] as to the advisability of this paragraph. He has indicated that we ought to use convict labor—use it for the purpose of testing out whether or not convict labor may bring down the prices of commodities. Neither can I agree with my eloquent and forceful friend from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] that the opposition of this bill and this particular paragraph comes wholly from a few selfish manufacturers who desire to monopolize the cotton-manufacturing business. I can not take that narrow view of the situation. I might join him in his broad humanitarian views if he would come in with a measure that did not have special significance and privileges for the convicts of the Atlanta Penitentiary. When the gentleman from Indiana states that to experiment in the manufacture of cotton duck at the Atlanta Penitentiary would result in giving to the Attorney General and the public information as to the profiteering of outside cotton manufacturers I again disagree with him. That plan would work out because the Government would have an undue advantage over the private manufacturer. The Government owns the Atlanta Penitentiary. The Government reared the buildings. The Government maintains the convicts. It gives them their board. The Government has erected new buildings in which this factory is to go. By this bill it is providing the machinery which the mill hands there are to operate. The Government will pay all the expenses. There is not a private manufacturer in the land who would not jump instantly at the opportunity to compete with an outside public if the Government would bear all his overhead charges. The gentleman from Indiana fails to take this into account.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If the gentleman will permit me to make a suggestion, that would not be a fair test of the cost of the product if you figure on convict labor because the same test of efficiency can not be applied to men who are doing work because they have to and men who are working because they want to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Exactly, and there is another point which the gentleman from Indiana forgets——

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am afraid I will not have the time; they are going to draw the line to-day, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I want to correct the statement made by the gentleman. I did not state that the Government could manufacture cheaper than private individuals. I said that statement had been made here time and again, but I do say this, that because the Government had gone into the manufacture of certain things it had demonstrated that private enterprise was largely overcharging the Government for the same commodities and the result of that was private enterprises reduced their prices.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think that has been done——

Mr. WALSH. Not with convicts.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In certain enterprises with which the gentleman and myself are familiar, but in every instance the Government pays everything, all the overhead charges, and now controls the raw material——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. COX. It controls raw materials in the market just like private individuals, absolutely.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman to proceed for two minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want further to answer the gentleman from Indiana if I may——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman has not argued the merits of the motion to strike out the section. I would like to know what his real objection to the section is.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That it will enable the Government through the Attorney General to fix the price of cotton, which I think might be disastrous to the cotton planter in certain instances and to the manufacturers in certain other instances.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, and then I desire to proceed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. For one question. It has been said here repeatedly that this is a mere matter of bookkeeping. I would like to ask the gentleman's opinion as to the proper way to interpret this language in lines 3, 4, and 5, page 3:

And all moneys or reimbursements received from such sales shall be deposited to the credit of the working capital fund created by this act.

Does not that mean that there is to be an actual sale?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That may mean profiteering. The Government is going into the business of making money to add to the $360,000 capital appropriated.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is not a mere matter of bookkeeping by the owner of the property if there is to be a sale for cash and that is to be deposited.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is not a benevolent enterprise. The Government is going to put a practical cotton manufacturer in charge of this business to compete with outsiders, because he knows the cotton trade. But the gentleman from Indiana was endeavoring to show that we ought to use convicts—use them in competition with free labor to demonstrate certain theories. I can not agree with the gentleman in those premises. It seems to me we ought to protect free labor and let the convicts do other work which does not compete with free labor. The gentleman does not want to put manufacturing institutions out of business; he does not want to put free labor upon the street. It seems to me the whole object of the bill is wrong, and therefore I am justified in moving to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on striking out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania) there were—ayes 14, noes 35.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 1, after the word "section" strike out "3" and insert "2."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DYER. Upon the motion which was just voted upon I did not hear the vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes were 14 and the noes were 35.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that that is too late.

The CHAIRMAN. On that question it is, but if the gentleman desires to make a point of no quorum——

Mr. DYER. I was trying to get recognition and the Chairman asked me to wait.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to make the point of no quorum at any time. The gentleman makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-three Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WEBB Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 14, noes 54.

Mr. WEBB. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. WEBB and Mr. DYER took their places as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 1, noes 103.

So the motion to rise was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum is present. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Attorney General is hereby authorized and empowered to provide for the payment to the inmates or dependents upon inmates of said penitentiary such pecuniary earnings as he may deem proper, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe. Such earnings shall be paid out of the working capital fund.

Mr. ROBBINS and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is recognized.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 3, line 11, after the word "fund," insert the following words: "but such rules and regulations shall under no circumstances give to the inmates of the Atlanta Penitentiary any advantage in wages or hours of employment over free labor similarly employed in Government institutions or independent manufacturing establishments.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, that amendment speaks for itself.

The majority is embarking in the convict-labor business and doing it on the strength of a letter from the President of the United States which does not establish the bill as a war measure. This is a serious piece of economic and political business. It is legislatively immoral to pay to convicts in a penitentiary higher wages or give them more favorable hours of employment than are enjoyed by free labor outside. It is unfair to assume for a minute that the Government of the United States under the operations of any administration would give to criminals an unfair advantage over free labor.

There are no conditions with regard to the rules and regulations that the Attorney General may establish for the practical operation of this convict mill at the Atlanta Penitentiary. It may be that the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX] will be proven, that goods can be manufactured cheaper in a penitentiary than they can be manufactured by free labor outside. The Attorney General or his expert cotton-manufacturing adviser will have power to fix the rules and regulations. That may be. But I would have it certain that outside labor is to be fairly treated.

My amendment brings the House face to face with the proposition whether you propose to prefer a convict in the matter of wages and hours over the free labor outside.

It presents to you squarely the question of whether you propose, under the pretense of Government operation, to put out of business by cheap convict labor or overpaid convict labor the industrial establishments in competition with the penitentiary. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Yes, you cry "vote;" you will have trouble if you force it. I do not object to your crying "vote," because I want to emphasize, and have it emphasized to the public, that the party in power is cramming down the throats of Members of Congress, some of them avowed advocates of free labor in this country, a bill which proposes to give a preference to the criminals of the country working under the Government in a penitentiary. If gentlemen can stand for it, it is up to them. My amendment proposes that there shall be no favors to the convict which free labor does not enjoy. It is an amendment in the interest of free labor everywhere. It is an amendment in favor of honest work. It is an amendment in favor of fair and free competition.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman permit a question? Do you want to make the labor in the penitentiary work the same number of hours as labor on the outside?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I do not care, provided the terms are not more favorable than to men outside. They get board on the inside. The gentleman is aware that certain restrictions have been placed upon manufacturing establishments, due to regulations put in Army and Navy bills, and that there are certain disadvantages under which free labor and employers of free labor now work. And he does not propose to provide in his bill that the same conditions and restrictions which hold as to outside establishments shall prevail in the Atlanta Penitentiary, where it is proposed to give favors to the convicts.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I fear, entirely misunderstands the purpose of the bill when he proffers this amendment. I think I am very frank when I say that there should be no desire upon the part of anybody to bring convict labor in competition with free labor. There can be rightfully no such competition. The object of this bill is to afford to those who are serving penal sentences some way of maintaining themselves and their dependents and some way of paying their debt to society. There is not the slightest pretense that the Government is trying to enter into any industrial operation against free labor. It is only an idea of affording employment to men incarcerated in a penal institution, either by working in fields, on roads, or in factories, in order that the work they are engaged in may lead to their upbuilding, may lead them to become useful and helpful citizens in society again.

I do not view this question as a sentimentalist. I have viewed this question with the utmost practicality. I believe imprisonment means two things. First, it means that when a man is imprisoned because of a crime, society is temporarily protected against a vicious man; secondly, it means a deterrent for those who might commit crime. But it also means when imprisonment is imposed that it should be attended with reformatory ideas, so that the man when released can sustain himself; can be an honest and useful member of society. If that is not true, when he is released he is thrown upon the body politic as a charge. He leaves a penal institution and enters on almshouse or enters a penal institution again, because he can not make a living.

Now, the modern idea—and I welcome it as one of the best of ideas—is that the man who is paying the penalty of the law and who is in a penal institution, if he has dependents, shall have the compensation for his labor applied to the care of his dependents. It takes into consideration the fact that otherwise society at large is compelled to take care of the family of a man who is in a Federal prison.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will yield, but I have not very much time to discuss this question.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman believe that this principle embodied in this bill should be followed in the manufacture of every article in all of the Federal prisons?

Mr. GARD. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman favor the principle embodied in this bill to the extent that it shall be taken up in all the prisons and have everything manufactured there?

Mr. GARD. I have advocated the principle advanced in this bill because it is the idea of equipping a building that we already have with machinery so that prisoners in this penal institution may be employed in making cotton fabrics, which in turn may be made into tenting and mail sacks and other things used by the Government.

Mr. DYER. Does not the gentleman also favor the manufacture of furniture and other things in the Federal prisons?

Mr. GARD. I have no objection to the manufacture of furniture. There was a suggestion that furniture should be made in the Leavenworth prison. Of course, these things are all matters of locality. Where lumber is and may properly be used, as in Leavenworth, of course it would be more appropriate to manufacture furniture at Leavenworth than to attempt to manufacture cotton duck at Leavenworth.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman also favor in State penal institutions the carrying out of this principle and putting in factories, and that the paid earnings in those institutions shall go to the families of the inmates?

Mr. GARD. I think so. It is one of the most advanced ideas in the treatment of prisoners who are confined in institutions, either penal or charitable, that if they are able to work they should be made to work, and their earnings applied to their families, because it helps a man's self-respect and relieves the burden of support from the State. If you put a man in prison it may be his first offense. Give him a chance to work and to be reasonably paid for his best effort. He is paid a certain amount of money, and it is sent to his wife and children. I say that that is one of the best forward steps that we are adopting in the treatment of prisoners; thus we redeem manhood and relieve society.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more. I took up a part of his time.

Mr. GARD. I do not want that much. I simply want to answer questions. I prefer three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. I suggest to the gentleman that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] can find, in the hearings before the Committee on Labor, where it was proposed to establish this duck factory—that is on the Booher bill—this duck factory at Atlanta, and a furniture factory at Leavenworth, and a pulp and paper mill at McNeil Island, a letter from the governor of Missouri, Gov. Gardiner, offering the Government of the United States the services of 2,000 prisoners in Missouri penitentiaries, to work on this sort of work.

Mr. DYER. What is the gentleman's point in reference to that?

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman was asking the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] as to whether he favored the establishment of a furniture factory at Leavenworth or any kind of establishment, and the governor of Missouri is offering the services of 2,000 convicts.

Mr. DYER. Does the gentleman favor that?

Mr. NOLAN. Absolutely, in every State of the Union.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield further.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. I will yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. ANTHONY. This section of the bill seems to provide compensation only for the inmates of the Atlanta Penitentiary. Why not provide compensation for the inmates of all the penitentiaries? The inmates of some of them labor twice as much as the inmates would do in a cotton factory.

Mr. GARD. This bill supplies only the equipment of the present building at Atlanta with machinery for the manufacture of cotton fabric, manufactured from yarn, to be converted into cotton fabrics there.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does not the gentleman see that he is making a discrimination between one class of convicts and another class?

Mr. GARD. There is no intentional discrimination. Where convicts are put to work during their imprisonment and do work and receive reasonable compensation, the money they make shall be sent to their dependent families, wherever they may be. But this is necessarily limited in this bill to the Atlanta Penitentiary. It is one step in the right direction.

Mr. ANTHONY. The gentleman is correct. But he would authorize the payment of compensation in this bill only at the Atlanta Penitentiary, and he would pay a man in this cotton mill for his labor, but a man at the Atlanta Penitentiary working in a brickyard or perhaps in some other employment may work at twice as hard a task and will not get any compensation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Or he might work at farm labor.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will offer an amendment to authorize the Attorney General to establish the principle of compensation for all United States prisoners.

Mr. WEBB. This section provides that the Attorney General may provide for the payment to the inmates or their dependents of such pecuniary earnings as he may deem proper.

Mr. ANTHONY. Why does the gentleman pick out only the inmates of the Atlanta Penitentiary?

Mr. WEBB. Because that is the only institution we are dealing with in this bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Why does not the gentleman broaden his provision and take in the inmates of all the penitentiaries?

Mr. WEBB. The turn of your institution will come next.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to have them all get a square deal.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. ZIHLMAN: Strike out section 4 and insert the following in lieu thereof——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the first amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania is an amendment to perfect the section. That will be acted upon before the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland can be offered.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have my amendment read. Several gentlemen have requested this.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 3, line 11, after the word "fund," insert the following words: "But such rules and regulations shall, under no circumstances, give to the inmates of the Atlanta Penitentiary any advantage in wages or hours of employment over free labor similarly employed in Government institutions or independent manufacturing establishments."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WEBB) there were—ayes 33, noes 52.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman, now I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ZIHLMAN: Page 3, strike out section 4 and insert the following in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 4. The compensation and hours of labor for inmates at the above institution shall be based upon the standard hours and wages prevailing in the vicinity in which the institution is located. The pro rata cost of maintaining the inmates so employed shall be deducted from their compensation. Such earnings shall be paid out of the capital working fund."

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I wish to say that the language employed in the amendment offered by me is taken from section 1 of the Booher bill, introduced by the gentleman from Missouri, which bill has been indorsed by Gen. Henry G. Sharpe, late Quartermaster General of the Army, and by the Secretary of War. I hold in my hand a facsimile of the letter written by the Secretary of War indorsing the language of the Booher bill, which contains the O. K. of the President of the United States, and from which bill my amendment is taken. This amendment provides that the inmates of this penal institution shall have the same wages and hours of labor as are received by free labor in the vicinity of the institution. I might say that a great deal of this cry which has been raised about free labor being injured by this bill does not apply to some of the employees of some of these cotton-duck factories. There was a strike in my own State of Maryland a few months ago by the employees of a cotton-duck factory, who received only $7 per week for 50 hours of labor. So that if the Government of the United States pays to the inmates of this institution the same rate of wages and gives them the same hours of labor as are paid and given in the great majority of the cotton-duck factories, they will not be paid an exorbitant price for their labor.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. COX. Were those employees men or women?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Women, principally.

Mr. COX. About how many employees did the mill operate?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I would say approximately—without knowing the exact figure—about 600 employees.

Mr. COX. Getting only $7 a week?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I would say again for the gentleman from Indiana's information that the employees of a large cotton-duck factory in Maryland struck for higher wages and better hours, and they received $7 a week for 50 hours work per week.

Mr. COX. Was that the final compromise?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. No; I do not say that was the final compromise. I do not know what the final adjustment was, but the grievance of the employees was that they were working 9 or 10 hours a day for $7 a week.

Mr. COX. I do not want to bother the gentleman, but this is very interesting to me, the idea of anybody working in these days for a dollar a day. How much were they getting before they struck?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Those were the wages and hours before they struck. I do not know what the final adjustment was.

Mr. COX. How much have they been receiving since the settlement of the strike?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I do not know.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the principle embodied in his amendment has the approval of organized labor?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. The language of my amendment is taken from the Booher bill, which has been indorsed by the American Federation of Labor, by the Quartermaster General of the Army, by the Secretary of War, and the letter of the Secretary of War, which I have here in facsimile, contains the O. K. of the President of the United States.

Mr. MOORE ot Pennsylvania. Then that looks like an official amendment. I am very glad the gentleman has offered it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I just want to say that I am in favor of this bill. I am in favor of the working of convicts. I do not think it is humane, I do not think it is just. to continue these men in idleness, especially at this time when the women of America are being called upon to go into the factories and the workshops and when you can go out from the city of Washington and within 25 miles can find women working on the railroad as laborers and section hands. We are certainly putting no imposition on the convicts or on the manufacturers of this country when we attempt to utilize the men. who are confined in Federal or State prisons. And it must be remembered that America has now nearly 2,000,000 men under arms, and that the great majority of these men are unused to military discipline, so there will be many violations of military regulations and many of the men in the military service of the United States will be incarcerated in these Federal prisons. The labor of these men should be utilized, and not only should their labor be utilized, out the money they earn should be distributed to their dependents. I can see nothing unreasonable in this proposition. We have already appropriated the money to build the building. Why should we not equip it with machinery and utilize the labor of these 1,400 men who are now confined in the Federal prison at Atlanta?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Which does the gentleman think is the greatest menace to the happiness of America to-day, the German enemies who are interned here or the men whom we have incarcerated in prison?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I would say the German enemies, if they be prisoners.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Is any effort made to utilize our interned German enemies for any purpose? Are they not put down at some of the most magnificent summer resorts and maintained by the people of the United States, who are taxed to sustain them?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I am not in the confidence of this administration, as the gentleman is, and will leave that question to him.

Mr. SIMS. They are not prisoners.

Mr. RAGSDALE. What are they?

Mr. SIMS. Interned men.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the House should adopt this amendment. If the goods which it is proposed to manufacture in this prison were to be sold on the market in competition with other like products it would be a proper amendment; but this bill does not permit the products of prison-made goods to come in competition with goods made by free labor. The goods are all to be used by the Government and not sold. We should not burden the Government by compelling it to pay the highest wage or a large wage to the prisoners; there is no necessity for that. In my State we have a system under which we pay our prisoners, but we do not pay them the going wage. When they first enter the prison, especially if hardened criminals, they do not get a large wage. But we hold out to them the hope that if they will behave themselves, and do good work, they will get higher and better wages from time to time. It seems to me that the Attorney General in administering this law ought to have the discretion and power to say to the men on entering the prison, "If you will try to get along here, if you will observe the rules of the prison, and endeavor to improve in the work that we ask you to perform, we will increase your pay from time to time." I think it is important that prisoners be paid. Many of them have families or other dependents.

The payment in my State is made to the prisoner, or, if he has dependents, it is made to his dependents. That gives him an interest in life, something to work for. There is a great difference in the guilt of prisoners. Some men are convicted of offenses involving no serious moral wrong. It seems to me that the Government ought to have power to determine who shall receive pay and how much. Some ought to receive more pay than others. We ought not take from the Government discretion to pay the men who are there only for misdemeanor or minor infractions of the law more than the men who have committed murder, arson, or other serious offense. I think it is important that we should leave in the hands of the Government discretion in cases of this kind. [Applause.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, this is a proposition to expend at this time $1,000,000 for machinery to equip a building that is vacant and empty at Atlanta, Ga.

Mr. FESS. A portion of it goes for a farm.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A part, it is said, goes to buy a farm; but the point I make is that there is not a man in this House who has not an empty building in his district who would not be glad to have the Government equip it with machinery, and, in addition, to buy a farm and operate it for the manufacture of duck. So there is nothing in the fact that the buildings are there.

I want to say that I am not a man with a perverse heart. I am not an enemy of humanity. I am not ashamed to say that I have worked at the hardest kind of menial labor in order that I might go to school and educate myself for after life; and, further, I know that a part of the greatest book that was ever written—the Bible—as well as Pilgrim's Progress, were written in prison, and others I might name; so that a prisoner can profitably employ his time if he is so disposed or inclined.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will permit, I want to say that it 's just this homely story that the gentleman is telling that endears him to every Member in the House.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I thank the gentleman. No one knows the benefit of education better than I do. If I had thousands of dollars which I could leave to my son for profitable investment in the world, I would not leave him one farthing if I had to choose between that and an education for him.

Ignorance blots out the beauties of the universe and leaves us in darkness. Education is the greatest boon to the human race. Give these unfortunates learning and you lift them out of the criminal class.

The trouble with this bill is that you are starting on this problem of equipping our penal institutions at the wrong time under world conditions. We have so great a need for money to sustain our Military Establishment that we ought not to use this money for prison purposes just now. We need the money for Army uses. God bless the boys that are carrying the guns. [Applause.]

I want the same spirit, the same morale, back here at home that the boys are exercising in the ranks, and we are doing wrong in taking this money for this civil employment when there is factory after factory that could make this particular product and all that the Government needs.

They say that the prisoners should have labor. That is all right. Is there a man that says that the prisoners are too proud to break stone? Is not that legitimate work? Is it not legitimate work building roads? One of the best penal institutions in the United States works its prisoners and they do not come into competition with a day's free labor. I call attention to the prison in the State of Minnesota. They do not come into competition with a day's work of any laboring man.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, with pleasure, to my friend.

Mr. FESS. How is it possible that a man who works on the road as a prisoner is not in competition with the man who would work on the road if the prisoner was not doing it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, he does come in competition that far. But there is no great competition in breaking stone. Road building seems to be profitably done by prisoners. It has grown into a customary employment for them. Every State in the Union has a statute to work prisoners on the highways. It requires very little or no capital, and at this time we need all our money to lick Germany and win the war. My colleague wants the prisoners to be educated. He can do that by turning over to these men in their cells books where they can educate themselves.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman from Michigan advocate absolute idleness of these prisoners?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Far from it. I advocate work for them, but I do not advocate appropriating a million dollars out of liberty loan and tax money to buy machinery we do not need at this time when we do need it for powder and bullets.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What kind of work would the gentleman employ the prisoners about?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Any kind of work—they could make binder twine and work on the highways and prison farms.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Would not that require machinery?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; but let me tell the gentleman that you can not get the machinery to equip this building within a couple of years' time. I want to say further that there are a number of factories in the United States that will make all the cotton duck that the Government needs, and the necessity of this expenditure of money is not apparent. Let us get into the war game and win that before we take up these economic society-welfare prison-reform and criminal humanitarian questions. The winning of this war is a real undertaking, demanding all our resources and supreme efforts. Lay this prison reform on the shelf; sidetrack it. The future of our country is in the scales. Let us fight our enemy; pave the way for our Army and equip it. Some of the boys over there will say, "What is Congress doing? Passing laws to buy machinery to make duck after one or two years. Where are the aeroplanes? Where are the ships? Where are the guns?" Some one over there is calling "Hurry up!" Let us obey.

We do need the money to help put down this war and clean up on our enemy.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman put in his remarks at this time that the Chamber of Commerce of the United States is now petitioning the Government of the United States to give better roads for war purposes, and that seems to be recognized as a war measure?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I shall be very glad to adopt that suggestion of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask that the gentleman be given further time, in order to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Michigan, to whose talk I have listened with a great deal of interest for the last few minutes, if he does not think there ought to be an amendment put on this bill to enable the department to unwind the red tape that is being employed so much every day?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am in most hearty sympathy with the suggestion of the gentleman, and next week we will be given an opportunity in a bill which is coming up, and for which I shall be glad to use what ability I have to see pass, for that purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he did not think that these convicts ought to be put to making rolls, and that they will not be so large but what we can wind this red tape on somewhere or somehow?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There are many employments on which these men can be put that is needed worse than this. [Applause.]

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I can not understand why men will advocate the use of a system in their own State that brings the products of convict labor in competition with the products of free labor and then in the House of Representatives oppose a measure that utilizes the labor of convicts for the most beneficial use for the Government. Now, the State of Michigan not alone has the State-account system but they still have the contract-labor system. I understand that the knitting contract at one of their penitentiaries is still in effect up there, and that as soon as that contract is finished they intend to abolish the contract-labor system.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NOLAN. Just let me go on for a moment.

They also have the State-account system. Now, I do not know why the gentleman from Michigan—Judge SMITH—ought to be so solicitous about the textile manufacturers, or more solicitous about them——

Mr. MADDEN. Did the gentleman say Judge SMITH or Banker SMITH?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Farmer SMITH. [Applause.]

Mr. NOLAN. Well, Judge SMITH, or Farmer SMITH——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Attorney SMITH.

Mr. NOLAN (continuing). Than he would be about the farmers of Michigan. Now, they have a canning factory in their prison; they also have a prison farm in Michigan. They can the products of this farm. They not alone sell that product in competition with other manufacturers in the State of Michigan but they sell them in Indiana, Ohio, and other adjacent States, in competition with the products of free labor.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman means they sell the farmers from Michigan in other States?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Does the gentleman know anything about the per diem paid to the inmates of these prisons?

Mr. NOLAN. Of course, they do not pay anything.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. They do not pay anything?

Mr. NOLAN. They do not pay anything.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They are not sent there for that purpose.

Mr. NOLAN. While the gentleman objects to the Government of the United States utilizing the labor of their convicts in producing something that we are going to use and that does not go on the market in competition with free labor at all. Is there any consistency in that?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to ask the gentleman a question. I want to ask the gentleman if there is a penal institution in the United States that does not work their convicts, and, further, if there is anything in this bill or in this question, except the purchase of machinery, that they can not get for two years while there is a contract now wanting to be made by dozens of institutions of the United States?

Mr. NOLAN. There are hundreds of canneries in this country that would sell the products of their factories down in Indiana and Ohio, and they would be selling there if the Michigan State Penitentiary was not going into that market and competing and putting down prices.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman from Michigan states there are hundreds of factories anxious——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I beg the gentleman's pardon; not hundreds, I said dozens.

Mr. NOLAN. I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina, what difference is there if there is——

Mr. WEBB. But I wanted that put in the RECORD. The Council of National Defense says that they are 6,000,000 yards short of this stuff, and any gentleman who has got this to sell could sell it there.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They will not get a contract.

Mr. MADDEN. What about those letters?

Mr. WEBB. They did not write to the Council of National Defense.

Mr. MADDEN. The man at the head of the bureau ought to have sense enough to refer a communication to somebody who has authority.

Mr. WEBB. That does not answer it. The Council of National Defense are very sure that this machinery would be secured in six months.

Mr. NOLAN. I will say that, possibly, I could put in the RECORD here the complaint of 40 men on the Pacific coast that have been here in reference to contracts. It may not be textiles, it may apply to something else. Now, why should not the Government of the United States be permitted to utilize the labor of convicts in the penitentiaries the same as the States are using them. The State-use system is in effect in the State of New York. If they want to manufacture shoes for the use of the State or clothes for the use of the State, or anything else for the use of the State, they go ahead and do it, and that is exactly what this bill provides for that the prisoners at Atlanta will be used to manufacture cotton cloth for the Army and Navy and Shipping Board, and as labor becomes scarcer and scarcer this mill be running and producing cotton duck for these departments, as well as for the Post Office Department.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. What do you mean by the State-use system? Do you mean the manufacture of stuff that the State uses in its State capacity?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; or any other governmental use they might have.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Let me ask you a question in order to see that if I caught your position right. The Government to-day needs guns, it needs harness, it needs food, it needs various kinds of supplies of steel and iron; are you in favor of convicts manufacturing all of that stuff?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. You are in favor of it?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. And ammunition?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes. But I would diversify it. I would give every man in the penitentiaries a chance to become a useful citizen when his term expired, and I would compensate him, not alone by money, but in time off, and arrange it so that no particular line of business nor no particular class of labor would be seriously affected.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think the gentleman stated the other day, and if I am in error he will correct me——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think the gentleman from California stated the other day, and if I am in error he may correct me, that the Federation of Labor was in favor of this particular bill, as he understood it?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; the principles involved in this bill. This bill is virtually taken from the Booher bill—a section of it. The Booher bill provides for the establishment of three plants, this cotton-duck plant at Atlanta, Ga., a furniture factory at Leavenworth, Kans., and a pulp and paper mill at McNeill Island, Wash.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Do you think that union labor is in favor of the proposition now advanced by the gentleman in the manufacture of cotton that the Government might use?

Mr. NOLAN. As far as the labor of convicts can be utilized, every one of them; yes. That is their position. They contend that, and not alone the Federation of Labor, but everybody who has given this thing any study and is sincerely interested in prison reform, is behind the State-use system, and that means that the State or the Government can utilize the labor of the convicts in producing anything the State uses. It takes out from the open market the element of competition. There is a difference between that and the State account system, where the State takes the place of the old prison-labor contractors and manufactures itself and puts the products of the convict in the open market in competition with free labor. Now, that is the difference between the two systems.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They can do it now under the law?

Mr. NOLAN. Who?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Any penitentiary.

Mr. NOLAN. Any State can adopt any system it wants. The most progressive States in the Union, though, have adopted the principles involved in this bill—that of State use.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Did I understand the gentleman to say the policy of union labor and of the Federation of Labor is that the State might manufacture anything by convict labor for the State use?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. So that it does not come in competition with free labor in the open market?

Mr. NOLAN. Not to be sold in the open market. Any form of prison labor displaces outside labor if they use it in any sort of useful or gainful employment. You can not apply the labor of a convict in any way in a penitentiary unless he displaces some one. If you did not have him, free labor would have to take his place. Now, unless you want to keep them in idleness, the people that are most interested in this great subject of advocating the State-use system——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. NOLAN. I yield.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Society is divided into two classes—one that keeps the law and one that breaks the law. If either one of them is to be idle any portion of the time, you would be in favor of the criminal being idle, would you not?

Mr. NOLAN. Under certain conditions I would. I will say this: A man may be idle on the outside, but can find something to keep him employed. Inside of a prison wall, if he is kept in complete idleness, he will go insane—either that or he becomes a great problem. The last thing in the world we should do is to legislate in any way that would mean that prisoners would remain idle. There is no way in which students of penology in this country have ever devised a plan for taking care of criminals in idleness.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will admit that. For eight years of my life I was prosecuting attorney of my county and had a good deal of experience in this line, of course. My experience, however, taught me this, that if one of the two classes that society is divided into had to be favored it ought to be the man that had kept the law and observed the decrees of the society in which he lived.

Mr. NOLAN. Of course, that is true. But we have never conceived—and I have heard a good many men that came before the committees of which I am a member, and I have read a good many books on the question of unemployment—of how to solve that problem. I have not found anybody who had a panacea for that ill.

I want to call the attention of the House to another consideration. It would probably not be good policy to talk about the men we are sending to the front at the present time or to predict that any of them will come back as prisoners. But you might as well face this situation in a common sense way. In every war in which we have engaged we have had a lot of men that have been sentenced to hard labor for infraction of the rules of war. In ordinary times a man will commit an offense which would not be serious; but a man that is insubordinate in the Army in time of war commits a serious offense, for which he is court-martialed and sentenced to hard labor. Some of these men are coming back to this country by the thousands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DYER. I wanted to ask the gentleman what evidence he had that tens of thousands of soldiers are coming back in irons and chains?

Mr. NOLAN. I did not say that our men were coming back in irons or chains. I said if our experience in the past is any indication of the future, when we are going to have millions of men involved instead of thousands before, they are going to come back by tens of thousands. And you have got to have some place in which to put them, and some occupation for them when they get there. Why not face this situation? Down here at Atlanta you are starting a cotton-duck factory in which you employ 500 men. You are going to acquire some land, too, if you pass this bill. There will be some place to put these young men who are not criminals in the ordinary sense but who have committed a breach of military discipline.

This is the first step in taking care of a situation of that kind. The Booher bill provides that the Attorney General shall have the power to contract with all of the penal institutions of this country—State, county, or any sort of correctional institutions—for the labor of all of those prisoners, figuring that we will have a labor shortage during this war. Does anyone believe that, with millions of men taken out of industry during the next two or three years, we shall not have a serious labor shortage? England has had it, and France and Italy have had it, and Germany has had it, and they have had to use the labor of women in employments that are ordinarily occupied by men.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. As to what England does with her military prisoners, is it not a fact that she puts them in the workhouse and makes them pick oakum?

Mr. NOLAN. She has released prisoners from the prisons in order to send them to the front to fight.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman can find a man in the list of killed to-day who is of that class.

Mr. WEBB. In England they make the prisoners make all the mail sacks.

Mr. NOLAN. You will be obliged to find some way to utilize the services of convicts. Such a power as that is conferred on the Government by the Booher bill. Some bill of that kind should be passed. If you do not pass a measure of that kind at this session of Congress you will have to pass it at the next session.

Mr. MOORE of Pennylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman a question about competition after he has sufficiently developed his argument along the line he has selected. The Government needs cotton duck. There are two places to obtain that cotton duck. One is from private establishments and the other is from the Atlanta Penitentiary. If the Government buys it from the Atlanta Penitentiary and does not buy it from private establishments, will not the question of competition enter at once?

Mr. NOLAN. No. The question of the displacement of labor does enter. The question of competition does not, because the product of the Atlanta Penitentiary will not be sold in the open market. It is a displacement of labor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then the man who labors in prison displaces the labor outside?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes. That is the point. If you can show me any system where you can employ your convicts on any kind of work whereby they will not displace the labor outside, I will be for that.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the case of labor on good roads and on other public works——

Mr. NOLAN. Oh, that is not the point. The poor itinerant laboring fellow on the outside has not as many friends as the cotton manufacturer. He has not anybody to speak for him.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He has not the necessary training. It will take time to train these men to work in a cotton factory.

Mr. NOLAN. Well, if the gentleman does not think it will require labor and skilled labor to make good roads, he should look into the matter more carefully. They have engineers to plan and execute the roads, and they have skilled labor to operate road-building machinery and also to lay the concrete and bitumen necessary in building up-to-date roads. You are displacing them all the time with convicts.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The Government is seeking men now to build roads. They could work on roads without displacing anybody.

Mr. NOLAN. You can not find a character of labor that any prisoner can be employed at where the prisoner will not displace free labor. The question is to do it in the fairest and squarest way. That is the State-use system, whereby the Government gets the only benefit of the labor of convicts, and no private individual or private contractor is permitted to exploit them. In the RECORD yesterday it appears as if I meant to convey the idea that no one appeared before the Labor Committee in favor of the Booher bill except those connected with the contract convict labor plan. What I meant to say was that no one appeared in opposition to the Booher bill unless he was in some way connected with a prison having contract prison labor or else some prison where the State sold the product of their penitentiaries in the open market.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, may the amendment be again read?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be read.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, is an amendment now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the amendment will be in order.

Mr. CANNON. Then I suppose an amendment to strike out the last word would be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. That would be a pro forma amendment.

Mr. CANNON. The right of amendment has not been curtailed? That is, there has been no order closing debate on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The last word has been stricken out several times.

Mr. CANNON. Let us strike out the last word, and then it will be subject to further amendment. I rise to ask this question: Has the debate been closed?

The CHAIRMAN. The debate has not been closed.

Mr. CANNON. Well, until the debate is closed it is subject to amendment. Now what is the amendment upon which the vote is to be taken?

The CHAIRMAN. The debate has not been closed, but the debate on this amendment has been exhausted. The debate on the amendment to strike out the last word has been closed. The gentleman can get time for discussion on the next paragraph.

Mr. WEBB. And the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] can get time on the next paragraph.

Mr. CANNON. I would like to have the amendment again read before a vote is taken on it.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] may have opportunity to speak now for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WEBB. Reserving the right to object, there is quite a desire here on the part of Members to get through this bill as quickly as possible, and I know that my friend from Massachusetts will help it along. I wanted to ask if he could reduce his time to five minutes?

Mr. WINSLOW. If I should review all the misstatements that were made, I should need an hour. I would like to refer to a few of them, to set the Members right.

Mr. WEBB. Is the gentleman willing to take five minutes now and five minutes later?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri that the gentleman from Massachusetts may proceed for 10 minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. For the present I will object. I will not say that I would object after the gentleman from Massachusetts is through, but he might say something that would require an answer.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Massachusetts will be recognized for 10 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, yesterday I spoke on this subject and caused a few letters and documents to be read to the House. It did not occur to me then that I should want to use much more time, but statements made since have made me feel that I would be lax in my duty if I did not rise to the occasion.

Yesterday the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], chairman of the committee, made some statements which I fully believe he thinks are entirely correct, suggesting that manufacturers, if they had chosen to do so, might have obtained orders for cotton duck. He has further stated that a lot of cotton duck has been wanted in 1918, making that statement on the authority of one Mr. Albert L. Scott, chief of the division of cotton purchases, or something of that sort.

I want to give you a little history of this cotton-duck business. Last summer, in the month of August—possibly in September—I was in the office of the Quartermaster Department and there saw Gen. Sharpe. I come from a community which turns out in the way of manufactured articles something over 3,000 different items. With what I trust might be regarded as a commendable interest in my neighborhood, I proposed to the Quartermaster General that he let me know what articles he needed, in the hope that I might be able not only to get business for my own friends and constituents and citizens of this Republic, but also to help the Government in obtaining its needed supplies. Among the articles he mentioned as being most seriously desired in the immediate future and at the moment was cotton duck for tents and blankets. I thereupon communicated with the same Mr. Whittall, of whom I made mention yesterday, and he said: "It will be perfectly possible for me and for almost any other carpet maker to manufacture cotton duck by simply readjusting our machinery in order that we may comply reasonably with the requirements of the Government."

It resulted in my being pushed along the line step by step, tediously enough, but finally I wound up in what is known as the Munsey Building, that then beehive of nonaccomplishment, which we all came to know so well. [Laughter.] In due time I arrived at a department which then was presided over by Mr. Rosenwald, of Chicago, and I was ushered into the presence of Mr. Eisemann, who controlled the department which I had to deal with. He and his assistant and a couple of other men who came in intermittently said they did need tenting, and they wanted to know who this man Whittall was. I proceeded to demonstrate that he was a man capable of making duck. That resulted in Mr. Whittall being referred to a committee which did not seem to have anything to do with the Munsey Building, but had meetings in New York whenever the chairman or the secretary saw fit to hold a meeting. They had a meeting, and as the result of Mr. Whittall's suggestion a number of carpet makers assembled there and they talked the subject over, not with the chairman of the committee, who that day was unfortunately ill, but the secretary was on the job. As I remember it, the secretary was a dealer in cotton yarn. He was there and he knew that cotton yarn was what duck had to be made of, of course, and he also found that the carpet makers could make it. That had not occurred to him before. I would not make any reference at all to what took place at that meeting with the idea of suggesting that I really know, but from hearsay I was led to believe that it was clearly understood that the carpet makers were willing to undertake to make some cotton duck. The only point of real interest in connection with that, besides the opportunity for the Government to get some duck, is the fact that shortly after cotton yarn went up several cents a pound. [Laughter.] Speaking of that, while I am on the subject, it may be interesting to the Members to hear the contents of this letter which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

WORCESTER, MASS., April 25, 1918.

Hon. SAMUEL E. WINSLOW,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. WINSLOW: Doubtless your attention has already been called to the inflation in the price of cotton yarn compared with the price of the raw material.

One year ago, or, to be precise, April 1, 1917, cotton was selling in the neighborhood of between 18 and 19 cents per pound and we were paying at that time 25½ cents for 8/3-ply cotton yarn.

On July 1 we were paying 31 cents, and this price continued, with a little variation, until the fall, when prices commenced to soar.

November 1 we were paying 35 cents; December 1, 42 cents; January 1, 1918, 43 cents; February 1, 46 cents; March 1, 53 cents; and now, April 1, 1918, 57 cents.

At the time of the recent slump in the price of cotton, when spot cotton dropped below 30 cents, we were quoted the exorbitant price of 66 cents per pound on some 7/4-ply yarn for weaving duck for Government purposes.

We are offering these figures to you for your consideration, as we think some action should be taken by the Government to regulate the price of cotton yarn.

Very truly, yours, M. J. WHITTALL.

Mr. WINSLOW. The point of interest to those who raise cotton and vote cotton and otherwise handle cotton is that when cotton goes down cotton yarn goes up. [Laughter.] That may be a pertinent suggestion as to why some argue that we should run this plant in Atlanta.

Now, we come along to an utterance made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], in which he quotes as his authority for the fact that we are shy on cotton duck in 1913 one Albert L. Scott. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] merely produces Mr. Scott as making the statement that we have been shy all the year and will be shy many millions of yards. Yet I find that in my interest to do something for the Government—yes; and for the WINSLOW constituency, so that you do not have to refer to that again—I wrote a letter to the Council of National Defense on January 9 warming up the cotton-duck dish. I will ask the Clerk to read that letter.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

JANUARY 9, 1918.

Col. H. J. HIRSCH,
Council of National Defense, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR COL. HIRSCH: As of the 5th of January, 1918, Mr. M. J. Whittall, a carpet manufacturer of Massachusetts, wrote a letter to you in reference to duck, etc.

I know Mr. Whittall and his manufacturing plant thoroughly. The plant is of the first order and the largest carpet mill owned by any individual in this country. Its credit and quality of management are of the best. Mr. Whittall, the head of the business, knows it as a master of his art and can and will do whatever he undertakes.

I want to commend his communication to your most careful consideration if you are in need of anything which he can make. You would be mighty fortunate if you can get him started in the production of materials of which your department stands in need, and I hope for the sake of the Government that you may be able to find a chance to associate him with the undertakings of your department.

Believe me, with compliments,

Very truly, yours, SAMUEL E. WINSLOW.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given five minutes more, so that he may complete his statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts may be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINSLOW. Twelve days later the department of which Mr. Scott is the head got around to make an answer, which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE QUARTERMASTER GENERAL OF THE ARMY,
Washington, January 21, 1918.

From: Acting Quartermaster General.
To: Hon. Samuel E. Winslow, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have your letter of January 9, addressed to Col. H. J. Hirsch, regarding the facilities of Mr. M. J. Whittall, of Worcester, Mass., as a manufacturer of duck.

Our cotton-goods section has already been in communication with Mr. Whittall and we believe that he is now making samples for the Quartermaster Corps.

We sincerely hope that the facilities which Mr. Whittall has and his abilities can be of large use to the Government at this time.

Truly, yours,

ALBERT L. SCOTT,
Chief of Division.

By direction of the Acting Quartermaster General.

Now comes Mr. Scott in a letter to the Attorney General saying that they can not get the duck. You will note Mr. Scott admitted in January, 1918, that Mr. Whittall was making samples. Mr. Whittall has written Mr. Scott and the department several times, but could get no answer from January to the latter part of April. There is rank inconsistency here somewhere; there is a deplorable state of business somewhere. It may be that Mr. Whittall did not make the right kind of material, but if he did not the department has never notified him. They have used him to make samples and then used the samples as a basis of specifications. They have never notified him that the product was not right nor that his price was not proper, but they have howled and howled and howled again, through men on this floor, that they have not been able to get duck. They do not say that it was because the price was too high or because the quality has not been satisfactory nor that they have not had the proper samples.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WINSLOW. Yes, indeed.

Mr. MADDEN. The failure to get a reply to the correspondence indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts can be verified by a statement I propose to make. On the 26th of March I wrote a letter to the War Trade Board. On the 6th of May I got a reply in which they complained because I had the audacity to ask them for information. They said—not in this exact language—that they did not understand why a Member of Congress should interfere with their business; that they had been instructed not to reply to letters because they wanted to conserve the use of stationery. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINSLOW. No; like the gentleman from California, I believe in a humanitarian and fair consideration for prisoners, but when it comes to the question of war necessity, on which the chairman and the committee have based their plea in one breath, following it in another by a statement to the effect that this is a humanitarian bill—if they want to discuss it as a humanitarian bill—it is to offend the good will of this House in view of our agreement not to inject nor consider bills which were not war measures during this session. If this is a proposition in which the Federation of Labor or any organization is interested in starting a propaganda, it is unfair. The discussion of such an aspect of the bill has no proper place here in a war-time period. If they bring it in as a war measure, that is another thing. I am not wishing to discuss it as a humanitarian proposition or on a general or economic basis, but I am quite prepared to show that if the Government wants to get duck, and needs it, they can get it of proper quality at a proper price and more quickly than through the establishment of a plant at the Atlanta prison.

As to quality, the Government ought to know what it wants, and as to price it has the right to control that, and is doing it in more cases than one. Instead of that the Government comes here with a proposition to establish a new mill, with 500 looms and the necessary complement of other machinery, which can not be bought and delivered for at least a year or a year and a half. All the looms—and I say it advisedly—which are to be made in this country have been ordered for upward of a year ahead.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. WINSLOW. More than 90 per cent of the looms made in this country are made in the congressional district in which I live. On my last visit home, in connection with several lines of investigation I was making, I took up the loom proposition with the managers of the great plants there, and I found that all the machinery which they could make was spoken for and they were building over three-quarters of it for business of the Government. If the Government can get 500 looms in the United States, they will either get secondhand discarded looms, which well-informed manufacturers would not use, or else they will go boldly to these loom works and say, "You stop making them for a private manufacturer and turn them over to us." For what purpose? Not to increase the gross output in the United States but for some reason or other, which I do not undertake to state as reflecting my judgment, and merely to establish a cotton mill in a prison as a war measure. It is the difference between tweedledum and tweedledee.

To start up a mill means to take the skilled help from some other man's mill, where skilled help is needed—a foreman here, a superintendent there, a general manager somewhere else, when every man qualified is needed where he now is for an indefinite period.

This is not a good commercial proposition. If you will meet the question fairly as a war proposition, regardless of humanitarian impulses or pretensions, regardless of political consideration, regardless of whomsoever writes letters for or against it, you have only one course, and that is in fairness to the manufacturers of this country, in fairness to general business, to vote the bill down and let existing mills which can and will manufacture duck furnish that commodity. They subscribe to the loans; they subscribe to the Red Cross. Why rob them? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WINSLOW. They pay the taxes; they should not be pestered at this time, when we can not get along without them.

I believe I am right in saying that the business community will regard this as a direct legislative attack on the integrity of themselves, as manufacturers and producers, if, when you can add nothing to the gross production of the country, you are willing to divert machinery, skilled men, and others from private business to a Government prison plant in Atlanta. [Applause.]

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINSLOW. With pleasure.

Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman stated this would not increase the production. As a matter of fact, would it not decrease production inasmuch as it is the intention to use these looms only to half capacity?

Mr. WINSLOW. Well, that is a mathematical proposition—it surely would. We do not want to work these boys overtime. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAVIS. Would it not further decrease production by the fact that these looms will be put in the hands of inexperienced labor?

Mr. WINSLOW. You can not tell; this is a wonderful administration, and they may fill the prison up with skilled loom operators. Who knows? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. ZIHLMAN) there were—ayes 38, noes 54.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 6, strike out the figure "4" and insert the figure "3."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 11, after the word "fund" insert the following: "and when not employed under the provisions of this section such inmates of the Atlanta Penitentiary as may be physically fit shall be assigned to work on military roads."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the amendment is not germane to the bill and therefore is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It seems to me perhaps the decision was a little precipitous——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will pardon the Chair; debate has been exhausted on this amendment and the amendment to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I thought the Chair recognized me, and I had started——

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order debate is exhausted by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That there is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $650,000 for the purchase of machinery and other equipment to carry out the purposes of this act.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Which gentleman from Pennsylvania?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. ROBBINS.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 13, after the word "of" strike out "$650,000" and insert "$315,500."

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is very evident that this bill was drawn with some regard to a report filed by a commission appointed by the President of the United States under an act of the Sixty-fourth Congress, second session, which is found in House Document No. 1752. In following out that report, on the 12th of June, 1917, an act was passed appropriating $129,500 to construct a building to house this proposed cotton factory that we are going to install in the Atlanta Penitentiary. Now, that commission went into this whole question of establishing industries in Federal prisons, not only in regard to the Atlanta Penitentiary but as to the Leavenworth Penitentiary and the McNeil Island Penitentiary, and they proposed in regard to the Atlanta Penitentiary to erect a building there at a cost of $129,500, and, following that recommendation, we appropriated the money on the 16th day of June, 1917, by an act of Congress. It is proposed in this bill also to appropriate $350,000 as a working capital. Now, you come in with this bill with an appropriation of $650,000 for the purpose of purchasing machinery and equipment. If it was a good recommendation for the cost of the building, why is it not a good recommendation as to the working capital? Congress followed the recommendation of the commission as to the cost of the building, but refused to do so in other particulars.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. Not now; in a moment. I know the gentleman is going to get up and argue that the high cost of living comes in, but it does not come in to the extent of doubling the working capital that is needed here for this enterprise.

Working capital? Why, this committee went into the question of working capital, and it is said that the stock ought to be turned over every three months. And therefore you do not need a large working capital. This is nothing but a raid on the Treasury.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBBINS. No; not now. In the next item, $350,000——

Mr. BLACK. I wanted to call the gentleman's attention to the error.

Mr. ROBBINS. It was $250,000 in the report for working capital, but it is increased to $350,000 in this bill.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman permit me to state——

Mr. ROBBINS. And when you come down——

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman permit me to state that we have provided for 140 more looms in this bill than we provided in that recommendation?

Mr. ROBBINS. That has nothing to do with working capital.

Mr. WEBB. Certainly. It requires more material to work the looms?

Mr. ROBBINS. It does not require twice as much. You are simply going ahead here to spend money recklessly. You are embarking the Government in an enterprise here to spend over $1,000,000 at this time, and to be followed by an expenditure in the other penitentiaries by establishing factories——

Mr. AUSTIN. One million two hundred thousand dollars. We added $200,000 yesterday.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is true. Now, there is not any ground for the expenditure of this large sum of money. The gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] makes a distinction here that this is not competition with free labor, but is a displacement of free labor. I happen to have some constituents over here in the mail-bag manufacturing and repairing department, drawing the munificent sum of $2 a day, two women, one of them having worked there for the past 12 years. She wanted a transfer after working 12 years on repairing the dusty mail bags. I could not get anything done for her. This bill proposes, on page 2, line 1, to "manufacture mail sacks," not only make cotton duck but mail sacks as well, and, of course, it will put these people all out of employment. Whether you compete with wages or put a man or woman out of employment it has the same effect. It drives them out; it takes away their work and deprives them of their living.

There is one thing I want to say before I leave this bill in answer to the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN]. He made the statement that the real purpose of establishing this industry was to get a place for the soldier prisoners who will be found guilty of some crime or infraction of military law while serving abroad and who will come back after or during this war for punishment. He said that tens of thousands would come back here and serve sentences in these penitentiaries. I want to resent that statement. I have a service back of me of 16 years in the National Guard of Pennsylvania and of 11 months in the Spanish-American War, and I want to protest against the idea that anybody will be sent back under sentence for crimes committed in the service. It is a stricture on the soldiers that I resent. The statement is made without information.

And I want to say something more about the armies of the United States—and I know something about them—in this war. I have visited a number of cantonments.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more. I have not taken any time on this bill before.

The CHAIRMAN The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. Last week, gentlemen of the committee, I went down to Quantico, along with a committee, to visit the camp of the Marines, a branch of the Navy of this country—8,000 of them—and when they took us from place to place around that encampment we finally passed the guardhouse, and some of us asked why they did not take us in there. We were told by the commander of those troops and by the officer of the day that they had no use for a guardhouse; that in all this tour of duty they had not had a man in it. [Applause.] Here is a branch of the United States Navy in which the discipline is so perfect, the personnel so high in character, their patriotism so great that they have no use for guardhouses or prisons. And I say here and now to the leaders of the majority of this House that Congress need not establish these prisons, need not install cotton looms in them, need not establish a cotton-duck industry in the South with the expectation that the soldiers of the United States will be sent back here and put in them to work out sentences for infraction of duty—military duty—"over there." We have gotten along very well all these years without prisons, without establishing these industries in them to compete with free labor outside.

Under the existing law, by the provisions of the act of 1900—and I refer to the Federal Statutes, on page 36—these men that serve terms in Federal prisons are furnished with a suit of clothes when they are discharged and railroad fare to their residence and $5 in money. And that is enough. And not only that; we have on the statute books a system of parole, recognized throughout the United States, and a similar provision in all the States, whereby a prisoner for good conduct reduces the sentences imposed on him. And here we propose to set all that aside.

And another matter that goes far toward the good faith of this proposition is that in this same report of the committee appointed under the act of September 8, 1916, it is proposed to pay these people who make this cotton duck and practically make the United States buy these goods, saving public money very little, if at all. This committee that had this matter in charge and investigated it under the act of 1916 reported that before you can dispose of these prison-made goods under the system that is mentioned and described in this report that it will be necessary to repeal the various laws prohibiting the sale of convict-made goods. I read from page 8 of that report:

> The various laws and Executive orders which now prohibit or restrict the purchase of prison-made goods by the Government then will have to be repealed or amended in order to make these prison industries effective.

Is there any proposition in this bill or any other bill to wipe out these laws that forbid the purchase of prison-made goods by the United States Government? Oh, no. Why not? Simply because you are going ahead here to establish an industry by the expenditure of the public money, and you do not care whether you are going to put it into effect or not. The real purpose of this bill is to create a lot of places, launch the Government on a scheme here that will not stop with the end of the war, but go on, costing the taxpayers untold thousands and thousands of dollars.

Gentlemen, the proposition is wrong. It is wrong in principle. It is bringing in competition with the free labor of the United States prison labor. More than that, it is spending in time of war large sums of the public money that is collected by the sale of bonds, by the sale of war stamps—and for what purpose? To equip penitentiaries to weave cotton duck that will come upon the public market in great abundance and thereby destroy that industry. To equip penitentiaries for the purpose of using convict labor simply to bring it into competition with the free labor and thereby degrade the free labor of our country. And to that proposition, Mr. Chairman, I am unalterably opposed.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for the reason he has given and for others that I shall try to express.

It seems that the committee that made an investigation of this matter, and whose report has been read, recommended a much smaller amount, but the committee reporting the bill, with the feeling that now so often pervades the House—that money is coming in in immense sums, and coming easily, and other committees are recommending large appropriations, and they are being made—has thought it a good time to ask for more money than is needed.

I am a member of a committee that considers bills recommending large appropriations, and it has been our constant care to look over the estimates and make recommendations of amounts just as low as will properly meet the situation. A year ago we had before us a bill prepared by the department demanding appropriation of something like $25,000,000. The investigations of our committee showed conclusively to our minds that about $11,000,000 was all that could be properly used, and a bill carrying that amount was recommended to and passed the House. If we had listened to the recommendations of the department, if we had met their demands, we would, I believe, have wasted upward of $14,000,000, or if we had joined the rush and grab for money and more money, we would have yielded to the demand of the department and taken advantage of the careless attitude of Congress and put across an immense, an unreasonable, appropriation.

We are spending money so fast these days, appropriating much of it without proper consideration, as to appall the country, attracting the serious attention of the country, making the people resentful of the action of Congress, because it is necessary for them to go into their pockets and meet these expenditures with a heavy burden of taxation laid upon them.

I was talking only a few days ago with a distinguished gentleman from one of the Southern States who told of immense Government work going on in his district, where money was being wasted, extravagant wages paid, and extravagant profits reaped by contractors—waste everywhere. His people said to him, "Is this the wasteful way that money gathered by taxation from the people and the business of the country is being spent? And does the Government expect the people to continue to pay taxes and otherwise contribute money promptly and cheerfully? There will be loud and serious complaint if waste like this continues." It will certainly affect the morale of the people, and it will make it much more difficult for us to execute the revenue laws that we enact from time to time as it becomes necessary for us to raise and spend immense sums of money during this war. We ought to curtail expenditures wherever we can. We can do it, first, by making proper appropriations, following the reports of committees and commissions whose investigations have been thorough and proper and whose findings are not and can not be disputed. In my judgment this bill—similar bills having been before the House in times past—would not be before us now but for the feeling that this is a time to get easy money from the Treasury. Other committees are recommending large amounts. We have become accustomed to dealing with large sums of money. Money is coming in freely; it is going out freely—carelessly, even. This is evidently a time to put forward a bill and secure its enactment into law that would not be looked upon with favor at any other time. If this bill must be passed—and there seems to be a determination to pass it—we ought to scrutinize very carefully the amount it carries. Certainly we ought not to exceed the amounts estimated by those who have made calculations and know what they are talking about.

I heartily support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and trust that it will be adopted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment with just a brief statement. It is true that the recommendation of this commission in 1916 was as has been read; but since that time the Department of Justice and those interested in this project thought that we ought to put twisters into this institution as well as looms, because twisters are easily run, and prison help can do this. The estimates call for 78 twisters in addition to what the report recommended, and those 78 twisters will cost $135,000. In addition to the 359 looms recommended by the commission this bill upon estimates provides for 500 looms. The building is ready for these looms. That is what increased the estimates beyond those recommended by the commission. Further, the cost of machinery, of course, has advanced 25 per cent since the recommendations of that commission were made.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Does not the gentleman think this is a poor time to build, then?

Mr. WEBB. No. It is the best time. Here is the Shipping Board and the War Department and the Navy Department in urgent need of cotton duck, and——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. And waiting four months to answer a communication in which people offered to furnish the same kind of goods.

Mr. WEBB. I do not think they are the same kind of goods needed at all.

Mr. ROBBINS. I wish to call attention to the recommendation of this commission on page 6, at the bottom of the page, where they state that "the financial interests of the Government as well as the immediate interests of the prisoners should be considered, in prudence, and the commission recommends, therefore, a start on a comparatively small scale, but with the idea of enlarging the industries as rapidly as prudent."

Mr. WEBB. This is a small scale. If there were a proposition here to work all the 1,400 prisoners in manufacturing duck, there might be some kick about it on the part of private manufacturers; but 450 men to do work that 250 men can do on the outside is a small matter to make all this talk about. It is a small experiment. You are going to work only one-sixth of all the persons in this penitentiary. I hope this experimental plant will not be further curtailed. Everybody knows that there is an acute shortage of duck down in this country. The Army has got to have it to cover the wagons and make tents, and the Navy needs it and the Shipping Board needs it. Tell me why, when everybody demands that every man who can work ought to work, the convicts ought not to be made to work to help in equipping our Government for a successful prosecution of the war? Why should not the prisoners in the penitentiaries, who are now "eating their heads off," be obliged to work to help carry on this war and support themselves?

Mr. DYER. Would the gentleman be willing to offer an amendment, or a committee amendment, limiting this project to six months after the war?

Mr. WEBB. No. As I stated a little while ago, other countries put their prisoners to work. The prisoners in England make all the mail sacks. As far as the constituents of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] are concerned, this will not interfere in any way with them. The Atlanta Penitentiary is not going to make all the mail sacks needed.

Mr. ROBBINS. This bill proposes that it shall make mail sacks.

Mr. WEBB. Not at all. It is proposed that it shall make duck for mail sacks.

Mr. ROBBINS. Read line 9, at the bottom of page 1—"and canvas for mail sacks and for the manufacture of mail sacks."

Mr. WEBB. It would take all the 1,400 prisoners, and then you would not have enough to make the duck and the mail sacks for the Government.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not want to occupy much time on this subject, but it seems to me that it is a matter of very great interest to the people.

I have stated before that we are exacting from the people of the United States large sums of money to carry on this war. We are appealing to them to give up their money to aid the Red Cross in taking care of the sick and wounded soldiers. We are asking them to subscribe to the liberty bonds to their limit, and the administration—so I am informed through the press—are now beginning to advocate another tax law to get more money. I want to serve notice on them right now that they will get my opposition to a proposition of that kind to the fullest of my ability. We are taxing the people of this country more now in proportion to our expenditures in this war than any other people in the world are being taxed. As an illustration, from reliable estimates we will raise from taxing the people under existing law this year at least 35 per cent of our expenditures and borrow the balance of the money. Great Britain has taxed her people but 25 per cent of her expenditures. Canada has taxed her people 18½ per cent up to the 1st of January of this year, France 11 per cent, and Italy 9 per cent, while we, as I say, are raising 35 per cent of our expenditures in this war by direct taxes.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. KEATING. What will be the total expenditures for this year?

Mr. FORDNEY. An estimate has been furnished by the administration that our expenditures will be $12,067,000,000. I think the expenditures will exceed that sum.

Mr. KEATING. Does not the gentleman know that these estimates have been tremendously increased since Secretary Baker returned from Europe?

Mr. FORDNEY. I just said that in my opinion our expenditures will exceed that sum.

Mr. KEATING. But they will very greatly exceed it.

Mr. FORDNEY. But it is conceded by the administration right now the money that will be raised under existing laws this year will far exceed the estimates made when the laws were passed nearly one year ago.

Mr. KEATING. If the gentleman will bear with me just a moment——

Mr. FORDNEY. I will.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman is a very distinguished Member of this House, the leader of the Republican side, so far as the Committee on Ways and Means is concerned.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman is very complimentary.

Mr. KEATING. I am not complimentary. I am merely stating the truth.

Mr. FORDNEY. Thank you, sir.

Mr. KEATING. And the gentleman's statement, going out to the country, deserves to carry weight. Now, the gentleman has just stated that this Government is raising, through taxation, 35 per cent of the amount that will be expended during the present year or the coming fiscal year. I think the gentleman ought to consider that statement carefully.

Mr. FORDNEY. I did carefully consider it before I made the statement.

Mr. KEATING. In view of the fact that in all probability our expenditures will be $18,000,000,000 instead of $12,000,000,000?

Mr. FORDNEY. Suppose our expenditures are $18,000,000,000?

Mr. KEATING. That would change the gentleman's 35 per cent very materially.

Mr. FORDNEY. I would not make a statement under any circumstances that I thought to be incorrect.

Mr. KEATING. I merely want to call the gentleman's attention to the figures, so that he may correct his statement.

Mr. FORDNEY. The estimates at the time these laws were passed did show that we would raise in excess of $4,000,000,000 in 1918 by taxation from the people under existing tax laws. It is now conceded the amount of money that will be paid in taxes this year will exceed those estimates from $500,000,000 to $800,000,000 without any doubt. I do not base that on theory. Therefore, the taxes that will be exacted from the people this year will be between four and a half and five billion dollars. So if our expenditures this year in this war are $18,000,000,000—and it is not yet conceded that they will be—think of the proportion that we are raising by taxes as compared with other countries in the world; and again, the gentleman must bear in mind expenditures and appropriations are two things. This $18,000,000,000 appropriations will not all be spent this year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FORDNEY. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. To be exactly correct, our representatives in England report that in Great Britain 25.7 per cent of Great Britain's expenses have been raised by taxation and borrowed the balance. There is no occasion for taxing our people beyond what we have already taxed them; that has been given by the administration. It never has been done by any people of any country in the world. I have stated before on this floor, and I wish to repeat now, because some gentleman may not have heard the statement, that during the Civil War in this country for every dollar of taxes exacted from the people of the North there were $5.09 of borrowed money.

Mr. BAER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. I will yield to the gentleman for a brief question.

Mr. BAER. Is not the taxation lower in England because they take a greater proportion of the excess profits there than they do here in the United States? I should like to understand that, and I do not understand it.

Mr. FORDNEY. The total amount of money spent from the beginning of the war to the 1st day of January, 1918, by Great Britain is above $33,000,000,000, of which 25.7 per cent has been raised by taxes from the people for all purposes, and the remainder borrowed. Their war-profit taxes are no greater than ours. The percentages I gave for Canada, France, and Italy are correct. The balance of these expenditures has been met by borrowed money. Now, it is folly to propose to tax our people a still greater amount now, when these taxes will not be receivable until June, 1919. Why not wait until next winter or the next session of Congress, when we will better know the amount of money that will be required by our Government for the coming year before we pass such legislation?

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. If the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman from Colorado must be mistaken in his estimate that we will raise 35 per cent of our expenditures by taxation.

Mr. KEATING. The "gentleman from Colorado" did not make any such statement. The gentleman from Michigan made the statement, and the "gentleman from Colorado" suggested that he might have occasion to correct that.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me add further to my reply to the gentleman—I want to be courteous—that $18,000,000,000 the gentleman referred to includes the amount of money we are expecting to loan to the allies and covers also appropriations for the future. No, all this sum will be paid out in 1918.

Mr. KEATING. No; I do not think so.

Mr. FORDNEY. Twelve billion sixty-seven million is estimated for this fiscal year. That includes our loan of $6,000,000,000 to the allies.

Mr. KITCHIN. To be accurate, I think if you deduct the loan to the allies it will be $12,000,000,000, which was the estimate of the department 30 days ago when we had the bill up. The expenditures, including the loan to the allies, was $16,112,000,000.

Mr. FORDNEY. Let me call attention to the fact that it has been stated by the administration—and I have the figures direct—that our expenditures in round numbers are $20,000,000 a day. Figure that up and you will see that the loans to the allies are included in the estimates above given.

Mr. KITCHIN. I gave the gentleman the estimate 30 days ago; they are more now. It was $16,112,000,000, and that included the loan to the allies.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes; in round numbers, the loans to the allies are $6,000,000,000 this year, and therefore our entire expenditure is $10,000,000,000, not including our loans to our allies, and you are going to raise half by taxes.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I agree with the gentleman from Michigan that revenue legislation ought not to be had at this time.

Mr. FORDNEY. The gentleman is always right when he agrees with me.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is in error, however, in reference to the amount of appropriation and expenditures for the next fiscal year. In my judgment it will be over $30,000,000,000 when Congress adjourns.

Mr. KITCHIN. Thirty-one billion dollars.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is arguing indirectly here that we ought not to levy any more taxes. I disagree with him, but I think we can better levy the taxes at the next session, with a greater knowledge of our necessities, than we can now. I do say that in order to carry out his suggestion that 25 per cent should be raised by taxation—and I think it should be more, at least 33⅓ per cent—you will have to levy at least $2,000,000,000 more in taxes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. GARNER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with the gentleman from Texas, but I said 35 per cent, not 25 per cent, and he will agree with me, and does agree with me, that we ought not at this time to legislate to get money for the next fiscal year, but that we should wait, and not cross that bridge until we come to it. Now, let me go a little further. This bill at last has simmered down to this, that the advocates of this measure put the establishment of this cotton-mill plant in a Federal prison for humanitarian purposes. Oh, how generous you seem to have become to the criminals! Just at this time when we need the money so badly to support our Army in France you want to make a pleasure resort of Atlanta, Ga., for the criminals of this country, the poor devils in prison shut out from all pleasures of this earth. You want to make it as pleasant as possible for those people down there. Perhaps you figure that some of these I. W. W.'s that are running at large now will land in this prison, and you want to make a palace for them.

Mr. AUSTIN. The gentleman means a Federal prison.

Mr. FORDNEY. Yes. And you want to make a palace of the Federal prison at Atlanta, Ga., for these people. I could name a great many of them. The McNamaras are in prison. Before they were captured these men confessed to the destruction of 150 great buildings, bridges, and structures in this country, and the destruction of hundreds of lives. You want to make a summer resort for that class of criminals.

Down here at Hillsville, Va., a short time ago a family of Allens walked into the court when the law was being administered to some of their friends who had violated the law, and without a word of warning shot down the judge and the sheriff, several people in the court room, and one bullet pierced the body of a little 17 year old girl, a bystander, an innocent child. Two of these men, a son and a father, were executed; another father was sentenced to prison for life, and his boy to 20 years, and the remainder of the gang escaped. You would make Atlanta, Ga., a pleasure resort for that class of people. I only mention these things as they come to my mind quickly. The James brothers and their gang of the West who robbed one bank after another for years, shot down innocent men as they would shoot down a dog, when captured by the officers of the law and imprisoned, you in this great volume of kindness in your soul, in the goodness of your heart, for the sake of humanity, want to appropriate a million dollars of the people's money, wrung from them at this time when we are in the midst of this great war, to make a summer resort down at Atlanta, Ga., for criminals of that kind. Oh, in the language of the common people, in a slang way, you make me tired. [Laughter.] Gentlemen, I thank you.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have been in grave doubt as to how I would vote on this measure, but if there does exist, if it appeared that there did exist the emergency, the claim of the existence of which brought this measure before the House, there would be no opposition to it. Yesterday, however, we learned when the gentleman from Massachusetts was heard upon this floor, that such an emergency does not exist. We learned that no effort had been made to obtain these textiles from the mills which produce them regularly. But it seems to me that the gentlemen who have this measure in charge have made a graver failure than that of not showing it to be a military necessity. They were bound to show, in order to convince this House that this measure should pass, first, that we needed these textiles, and second, that they could be produced in this way. The weaving industry is a skilled and technical industry. Men who follow that industry follow it throughout their lives. They send way over to Scotland, England, and Ireland for trained men who do this work and bring them here and keep them for years in order that they may see that work of this kind is well done. The committee has not made a case for this reason. They have not shown the average length of the term of imprisonment of these convicts. To-day we have launched on a new method of treating criminals, the probation system; the system of allowing the prisoner at large, under the eye of the probation officer, is in vogue in our land. It is a new system; it is the system of the prison reformer. It results in indeterminate sentences, and men are kept in prisons for very short periods. They are not kept there as a rule long enough to enable them to learn such a technical business as that of weaving, and yet we propose, with no figures before this House showing the average length of term of imprisonment in the Atlanta Penitentiary, with no proof before us showing that there is one man in the Atlanta prison who knows how to weave, with no proof how long it would take a man to learn that skilled and technical business, with no proof that a man could become proficent in this work within the average length of imprisonment of these convicts, we are asked without any proof of this kind to appropriate a million dollars. I say that that shows an utter lack of foundation; of anything upon which this committee can build any substantial basis to ask any such appropriation.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. On the thought of equipping these men after they are out of prison, I think it is generally conceded that the most highly organized business is the cotton-textile industry.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. It is one of the rules of organized labor that no ex-convict can become a member. Where are they going to get a job after they are through?

Mr. DEMPSEY. That is true. That is an entirely different aspect of it, whether it is justified on humanitarian grounds of preparing the prisoner for his future life, but I say primarily they have made no case because they have not shown what the average length of imprisonment is, whether any of these prisoners are fitted for this work, what the average age is and whether at the average age they can become expert in an employment of this kind, whether they stay there long enough to learn it, and whether you can do anything whatever with this appropriation. With an utter lack of any tangible proof, without showing that the appropriation of this million dollars would be of any use whatever, with the complete failure of all these things, every item of which is necessary to make even a primary case, these men come before this committee and ask for this appropriation. I say, gentlemen, that at least this bill should be defeated now and sent back to them to take this proof and find whether there exists any one of these things upon which to base such an application. Until we have that proof we have nothing to consider. Until they come before us and present the facts there is nothing upon which to found an opinion. They come here without anything and ask that a million dollars be appropriated in these times of excessive expenditures, when each item should be scrutinized with most diligent care, and I say that under these circumstances the bill, at least for the present and until they present the proof, should be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that all debate on this amendment seems to be exhausted.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I oppose the formal amendment which was offered by the last gentleman who offered it. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to call attention just for a few moments to some of the facts with regard to our taxation referred to by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] says that it is probable that for the next fiscal year we will be required to raise $30,000,000,000. I ask the attention of the committee to the fact that these general estimates that have been made ought to be taken with a very large grain of allowance. For the present fiscal year the estimates which were made and the appropriations and the authorizations which were made were for $21,390,000,000. Those figures were gone over carefully, and it was supposed that amount would be needed for the present fiscal year. But when the bond bill was brought in, nearer the close of the fiscal year, those estimates were reduced from $21,390,000,000 to $16,116,000,000, a reduction of over $5,000,000,000 from the estimate.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. In just a moment, if the gentleman pleases. Now, then, of that amount of $16,116,000,000, $6,115,000,000 was loaned to foreign countries; so that the actual expenditures of the Government for all purposes was only a little over $10,000,000,000 this year. So, when the gentleman suggests that we will need $30,000,000,000, let us consider that proposition for a moment. We have agreed—and it is the general understanding and arrangement—that we are to furnish foreign nations $500,000,000 every month. That will amount to an expenditure during the next year of $6,000,000,000.

That will reduce the estimate that has been made of $30,000,000,000 to $24,000,000,000 that will be required for expenditures during the fiscal year. Now, consider $10,000,000,000 the amount that we will have expended this year, and how can it be argued that we will need to expend $24,000,000,000 next year? Gentlemen, we will not expend that amount of money. It is impossible to do so and spend it legitimately. I know expenditures will be increased over the amount expended this year. They ought to be increased. We have not spent the amount of money appropriated this year, not because we did not need the materials for which the appropriations were made, but because we could not or did not produce the material needed. I presume there is no patriotic American but would have rejoiced if the materials needed could have been provided. The reason the money was not spent was because the aeroplanes so much needed, the big guns and the machine guns we ought to have but could not get, were not obtained. The ships promised were not paid for because they were not provided.

Mr. MADDEN. They spent the aero money, did they not?

Mr. GORDON. A third of it.

Mr. TOWNER. About half of it.

Mr. GORDON. I saw a statement from the department that they spent $139,000,000.

Mr. TOWNER. The amount that was altogether appropriated was about $750,000,000. They have spent so far about $350,000,000 and the balance is unexpended.

So, gentlemen, we need not anticipate the expenditure of $24,000,000,000 for the coming fiscal year. I doubt if we will expend, and my judgment would be that we could not expend, more than $15,000,000,000 or $16,000,000,000. We shall make a large increase in the productive capacity of the Nation during the next year, but there is a limit beyond which we can not go. Besides, a large part of our expenditures made during the present year will not have to be repeated during the next year. Cantonments and training camps and shipyards will not have to be rebuilt.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. GORDON. Right upon that point the gentleman is now discussing, is it not just possible the increase in the Army, making a maximum of 3,000,000 men, for which the committee is asked to appropriate $15,000,000,000, may be found to be unnecessary?

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that we can not measure the expenditure of money beyond the productive capacity of the country. That is the thing that measures expenditures. We may say that we will have 3,000,000 men but we can not produce any more than we can produce, and that is the measure of our expenditures. We may enroll the men, but unless we arm and equip them and can transport and sustain them across the seas they will not be soldiers. But if we could arm, equip, and put in the field 3,000,000 men we would not need $30,000,000,000. Our military expenses this year will be above $8,000,000,000. With this we are promised 1,500,000 men in the field. If we double the number of men and double the expenditures we will require only $16,000,000,000 for war expenditures. If we add $6,000,000,000 for loans to our allies, we will have $22,000,000,000, or just about what was expected for this year. But if this liberal estimate is required, it will be $8,000,000,000 less than the $30,000,000,000 estimate. We can not justify piling $8,000,000,000 more taxes on the people than is needed.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAMLIN). The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will have the right to move to strike out the section after this motion is disposed of.

The motion is to close all debate on this section and all amendments thereto.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will first come on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to perfect the section.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, if that is my amendment, I wish it to be reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ROBBINS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 44.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has just been informed that there is a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 12, strike out the figure "5" and insert the figure "4."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. I would not want this section passed without a full understanding as to its import.

Mr. WEBB. I make the point of order that there can be no debate on this, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think the gentleman is in error. I gave notice I intended to move to strike out the section, and certainly have a right to debate that, and I have been recognized for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the Chair stated in answer to his inquiry that he certainly would have the right to offer the motion to strike out the section, but the Chair did not say that he would have the right to debate it, because the motion pending was to close the debate on that section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If the Chair so holds, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I shall urge the striking out of this section, because I would not want to have it passed without the House thoroughly understanding the effect of its action. It may be a surprise to some of the gentlemen on the other side to know that they have actually voted against the President of the United States on this section. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] a while ago, following an amendment offered by myself to put free labor on a fair basis with the convict labor that is to be encouraged by this bill, offered an amendment which provided that the wages paid and the hours of employment for these convicts at the Atlanta Penitentiary should be on the basis of the hours of employment in the vicinity of the penitentiary and on the basis of the wages paid outside. That was an important amendment. It was an amendment that contemplated fair treatment for free labor. It was an amendment which, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] said, had the approval of Samuel Gompers, the president of the American Federation of Labor; it had the approval of Gen. Sharpe, the Quartermaster General at the time he was conferring with Mr. Gompers and other labor leaders upon this subject; it had the indorsement, by letter, of the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, and it was passed up to the President of the United States and had his approval, his signature, in facsimile, being shown here by the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman is discussing a section that we have already passed over.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We have to vote upon the question of striking out the section, and I think the section should be stricken out in order to support the President of the United States. The gentleman from Maryland showed conclusively, although the majority evidently was napping at the time, that the amendment he had offered was the amendment that had the approval of organized labor, of the Secretary of War, and of the President of the United States, who attested by his signature his approval of that amendment.

Now, on yesterday the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]—and I do not wonder that he is concerned when we raise these questions—produced a letter from the President of the United States, saying to Mr. POU, a Member of this House, in substance, "I would like to see this bill passed." As a war measure? No; just because the President would like to see it passed; just as any Member of Congress, writing to the head of a department, would say, "I would like you to appoint this man," not for war purposes, "but because I would like to have it done." "It would please me, Mr. POU, if you would use your influence with Congress to pass this bill" was about all there was to it.

The gentleman from North Carolina yawns because of this apparent contradiction in his hitherto fine direction of this important bill in its rapid course through the House. [Laughter.] But I beg the gentleman to understand that he does not always stand with the President. Yesterday he was with him; to-day he is against him. Are we loyal to the President in this matter?

Mr. MADDEN. Would that mean that the gentleman was inconsistent or the President?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That's a pertinent question. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. ZIHLMAN] produced a photographic copy of a letter, signed by the President, favoring the amendment to give fair and decent treatment to labor outside of the prisons. It was dated September 17, 1917. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] produced a letter yesterday that was intended to sweep the House. It was the President's letter to Mr. Pou saying this Atlanta Penitentiary bill was "an important measure" and should pass.

The secret about this measure, gentlemen, is that we are inaugurating a system of prison reform under the guise of a war measure. At the beginning we were told that we were to deal only with war measures at this Congress. But the gentlemen who want to start industries in penitentiaries in competition with free labor outside see here an opportunity to secure an appropriation of $1,300,000, or thereabouts, for the Atlanta Penitentiary, and they are willing that convict labor shall be put on an equality with free labor rather than lose it.

I wish you to take note of the scene in this House to-day when, in spite of the great game of baseball being played yonder, Members wait patiently to vote over to convict labor the privileges hitherto enjoyed by free labor in this country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the section. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That there is created a fund, to be known as the working capital, which shall be available for the carrying on the industrial enterprise authorized herein or which may be authorized hereafter by law to be carried on in said penitentiary. The working capital shall consist of the sum of $350,000, which sum is authorized to be appropriated. The receipts from the sale of the products or by-products of the said industries and the sale of condemned machinery or equipment shall be credited to the working capital fund and be available for appropriation by Congress annually for the purposes set forth in this act.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows.

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 3, line 23, after the word "act," insert the words "until six months after the termination of the war with Germany, when the powers conferred by this act shall cease."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered for the purpose of proving this up as a war measure. [Laughter.] It has been represented as such by the committee in charge. If this is not to be permanent legislation; if the effects of it are not to pass from the Atlanta Penitentiary to the Leavenworth Penitentiary and to the other penitentiaries of the United States, then this amendment should prevail, because all war measures up to the present time, including those supported by the President, by letter or otherwise, have had some limitation placed upon them. The War Finance Corporation bill was so limited, and the other big bills brought in as war measures have been limited to a period following the close of the war, generally a six-month period. All functions were to cease within that limit of time. Now, is this a war measure? If so, what is the objection to the amendment? Why should we continue this business of setting up convict labor in the Atlanta Penitentiary to manufacture cotton duck against the free labor of the country six months after the war?

My contention is that good Democrats as well as good Republicans can not afford to take their stand to-day with the convicts against the free labor outside of the penitentiaries; but if they do this amendment will mean that the damage done by this bill, passed by an insistent majority, will be wiped out six months after the war. Convict labor will then stand as it has stood heretofore and may be given employment, but not in competition with free labor. Much of that free labor, returning from the battle fields of Europe to the United States, six months after the war, should be given a chance to earn an honorable living in an honorable way without convict competition. It doubtless will need it, and we should keep the opportunity open for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 36, noes 52.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. WEBB and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 50.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, reference has been made quite freely in this discussion to the Booher bill. During the progress of the discussion I sent to the document room and got a copy of this Booher bill, and I have it here.

It is interesting to see just exactly what the provision is in this bill about labor in these various penitentiaries. Section 6 of the Booher bill (H. R. 9683) provides:

SEC. 6. That the Attorney General of the United States is authorized and directed to establish, equip, maintain, and operate at the United States penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., a factory or factories for the manufacture of textiles, mail sacks, tenting, and other equipment for the use of the United States Government; and at the United States penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kans., a factory or factories for the manufacture of furniture and office equipment for the use of the United States Government; and at the United States penitentiary, McNeill Island, Wash., a pulp and paper mill for the manufacture of print and other kinds of paper for the use of the United States Government.

That bill was reported back to the House by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MAHER], chairman of the Committee on Labor, on February 22, and is report No. 336. I hold in my hand the calendar of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and I find that this bill is No. 135 on that calendar. Five numbers further down on the calendar is the bill reported by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] from the Committee on the Judiciary, which is the bill that we are now considering to-day, and which was reported to this House on the 9th day of March, at least half a month after the Booher bill was reported back to this House. The bill which we are considering provides only for the building of a cotton mill at the Atlanta Penitentiary, or the installation of the machinery there. It has been said that this bill was reported because the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY], who drew it, appeared before the Committee on Rules and insisted on his bill being reported to the House, and that therefore the Committee on Rules prepared a special rule and reported it back to the House. It is fair to presume, gentlemen, that the majority party of this House, controlling the Committee on Rules, knew very well what legislation along this line was pending, and that that majority party are responsible for the presentation of this bill proposing the installation of a cotton mill at Atlanta, Ga., and disregarding the penitentiaries at Leavenworth, Kans., and at McNeill Island, Wash. The responsibility for that rests upon the majority party in this House, and it is fair to assume that it is the policy of the majority to propose that there be installed in the South, at Atlanta, Ga., this institution for humanitarian purposes, as they say, but that the penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kans., and the penitentiary at McNeill Island, Wash., shall be disregarded.

Mr. WEBB. I understand that the Republican members of the Committee on Rules voted for this rule.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I can not disagree with the gentleman as to that, because I do not know anything about the facts; but I do know that your side of the House are chargeable with the formation of the policy of this House, and that your Rules Committee, dominated by your party, have brought in this rule and have asked us on this side of the House, and the representatives of the people here, to adopt a policy putting into operation what you say are humanitarian principles down at Atlanta, Ga., and disregarding other parts of the United States where the same argument applies just as well as it does at Atlanta, Ga.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. I desire to say that during the noon hour I took lunch with a distinguished Federal officer, about whose veracity and ability no gentleman on this floor would have any doubt, who has had joint charge with others of Federal prisons, and he said to me that the chief difficulty that they had with their labor problem where anything technical was involved was that the prisoners left about as soon as they were able to teach them how to do their work. That is just your problem here—that you are not sure that you can teach these men how to weave cotton duck within the time of the average sentence in the Atlanta Penitentiary.

Mr. SIMS. It has been said here by Mr. FORDNEY that they were put in for life.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Yes; and the probation board has the right to let them go.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not care to yield for general speech making. I have only a little time.

Now, let me say something else. Gentlemen, if this plea that you make here is good, it should apply everywhere. If it is good for the manufacture of cotton duck, it is good for these other things that are mentioned in this Booher bill. For instance, let me call your attention to the fact that the original proposition in the Booher bill calls for the manufacturing of textile fabrics at the Atlanta Penitentiary. It calls for the manufacture of furniture and office equipment at the Leavenworth Penitentiary for the use of the United States Government. I have gone through these new temporary and the permanent buildings here in this town, and I have seen thousands and thousands of loads of furniture delivered there, purchased some of it perhaps in Racine and at other points where there are furniture factories in this country. I dare say that the Government has paid more for desks for the use of clerks since this war began than it has paid out for cotton duck for the use of the Army. I dare say that the expenditures on that account have been greater. The same argument that applies to cotton duck also applies to furniture that is used in the offices of the Government here at Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. At the United States penitentiary at McNeill Island the Booher bill provides for a pulp and paper mill for the manufacture of print and other kinds of paper. I imagine that if the figures were before us we would find that we have paid out as much for paper during the last year, or since this war broke out, as we have paid for cotton duck. I am informed that the information committee, headed by Mr. Creel, has bought and is using about 4 tons of paper a day, and that $5,000,000 has been spent for that purpose since this war broke out in the purchase of paper. It is just as essential, therefore, as a war necessity that these things be looked after; and when provision is made by the Rules Committee for the reporting of the rule making this bill in order it is just as important that the majority party in urging the advisability of adopting this legislation should also care for these other things that are also war necessities and that ought to be cared for if the argument is good at all. Now, I suggest a good thing for this House to do would be to reject this bill, and then if the Booher bill is brought in here by the Rules Committee under a special rule the matter can be considered on its merits and on the proposition to extend it to the whole country and to all the penal institutions in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I will.

Mr. BARNHART. It has been said that at the Leavenworth prison the building is not ready. Would the gentleman be ready to vote for an appropriation for a building that has not been built?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. As to that, I am uninformed and will have to take the gentleman's word for it, but I am informed by older Members that the original building at Atlanta Penitentiary was not understood, at the time it was built, to be for the purpose of being used as a cotton mill.

Mr. BARNHART. But the building at Atlanta is ready, and they want the machinery to equip it to make duck needed by the Government. This building at Leavenworth is not ready, but as soon as it is ready probably a bill will be reported.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. At the same time the argument made for this would apply to Leavenworth.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman from Illinois vote for the Leavenworth proposition?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not believe that is a relevant inquiry, and I do not believe it is a question that calls for a categorical answer at this time. I am attempting to discuss the bill as it stands before the House, and the question whether I would or not accept some other bill for something else has nothing to do with whether I think it advisable to adopt this bill. The question is put only to confuse and not for any purpose in assisting in the determination of the matter.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized in opposition to the amendment. I am a member of the Judiciary Committee and have not taken any time on the bill either in general debate or under the five-minute rule. In the committee I was opposed to this bill, and I am opposed to it now. I believe that the information given to the committee by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINSLOW] leaves it utterly impossible for anyone to advocate the passage of this bill as a war measure. If the factories of which he told are able to furnish the duck required by the Government, there is no necessity for the equipment of this mill with machinery to utilize at the Atlanta Penitentiary. It would take several months at least, and the Government can procure the duck elsewhere without making this large expenditure.

I therefore want to devote a moment or two to the humanitarian side of this measure. I have always believed, and believe now, that penal institutions should be in harmony with the spirit of the age; that they should be something more than a penal institution. I have always believed that it was the duty of society in general to give the inmates of the penitentiaries such care and treatment that would tend in some measure to reform them, if there is anything in the character or personality of the convict to work upon.

But, gentlemen, I have never thought that the work of convicts in a closed factory was conducive to moral improvement on the part of the convict. There are many young men, men of immature years, who are admitted into penitentiaries because of some crime that did not arise out of a criminal instinct on the part of the criminal, that involved no moral turpitude, but came from the accident of circumstance for which he was not responsible. To place a boy of that kind in a closed factory, in intimate and close relationship with hardened criminals, men who are criminals by instinct, will not reform the boy but turn him out more of a criminal than when he entered the institution.

I believe in the employment of convicts; but I believe in their employment, so far as is possible, out in the open and not in the closed factory. [Applause.] I believe it is conducive to criminality rather than reformation to employ them in a closed factory. I am not able to speak from personal knowledge. I was not in the House yesterday, having reached Washington late in the afternoon, but I read certain statements from Members of the House representing the State of South Carolina that are in harmony with the views that I have. I have read in the newspapers and heard from well-informed people that those who were accustomed to the open, who live largely in the open, whose liberty has not been taken away from them, that the experience of labor of such character in the cotton textile mills has been anything but conducive to good health.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. STEVENSON. Has the gentleman had his attention drawn to the fact that convicts that work in hosiery mills were under the contract system? They were hired to the contractor, which is materially different from the situation proposed here.

Mr. REAVIS. I admit the difference, but I will say that there is no one who is denied the privilege of the open air, who is incarcerated in a penitentiary and who is taken from a dark and gloomy cell, put into a textile mill, worked there during the daylight hours, hurried from there back into the cell, who can possibly be a healthy man. It is not conducive to good health. I have heard it said and have read many times that those who work in the textile mills have their health impaired, probably from the lint in the air and probably from insanitation and many other things that conspire against health.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REAVIS. If a man who, after his work is over in a mill of this kind, is privileged to go to his home and work in his garden or walk on the streets with his children, who has the benefit of the sunshine and open air, if his health is impaired—and I think it very often is—what would be the effect on a man who is incarcerated in a penitentiary, herded from a cell to the factory and from the factory back to the cell?

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield once more?

Mr. REAVIS. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. Speaking of the health being impaired of those who work in factories, in my district there are an enormous number of people who work in the cotton factories.

When the call to arms was made a great per cent of the young men who went as volunteers went from those factories. Those factory young men were raised right in the factory, and I want to say to you that they outclassed, according to the record of the officials who passed on and examined them, those from the farms. The surgeons passed a greater percentage of the boys who had worked in the factory every day and had begun their work there than those who came from the farms.

Mr. REAVIS. Then the logic of the gentleman's statement is that work in a textile mill is more heathful than work on a farm.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am stating that the gentleman's conclusion that it is unhealthful is not borne out by the facts.

Mr. REAVIS. My conclusion that it is unhealthful to work in mills of this kind has been repeatedly stated in textile journals and in the press.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. For a short question.

Mr. BURNETT. Does the gentleman quote the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] as having admitted that it is unhealthful to work in the textile mills?

Mr. REAVIS. No; I do not wish to be so understood. Mr. LEVER'S remarks, as I read them in the RECORD, were that he referred to the fact that work in a hosiery mill in a penitentiary had proven deleterious to the health of the convicts. That is as far, I think, as he went. Now, there is one other suggestion I want to make. I do not know that I am entirely correct in the information that has come to me, there are those on this floor who know more about it than I do—the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] and the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN]—and if I am incorrect I want to be corrected. I have heard it stated repeatedly that these convicts ought to be educated in some line of employment that they could follow after they have been released from the penitentiary. I think that is a most excellent idea, but I have understood that the cotton-textile business is one of the most highly organized businesses that there is in this country, and I have understood further that it is one of the rules of organized labor that an ex-convict can not become a member of its organization. Now, if it be true that the cotton-textile business is highly organized, if it be further true that an ex-convict can not become a member of organized labor, what good will it do the convict to educate him in a business that circumstances will not permit him to follow when he is released from the penitentiary? Why not educate him, if we are to educate him at all, in an employment and business that he can follow after his release?

I believe, upon the grounds of humanitarianism, that any bill that tends to furnish employment to the convict while incarcerated is a good bill and its purpose is a good purpose; but I believe that a measure that puts those convicts in a closed factory in a textile mill, that brings into intimate association a lad who is not a criminal by instinct with a man who is a hardened criminal will absolutely destroy the boy who has gone into that penitentiary because he is a victim of circumstances. I believe for that reason, and for the further reason that the time is inopportune for a measure of this kind, that the bill should be defeated. I opposed it in the committee; I oppose it here. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois), there were—ayes 37, noes 54.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment pending at the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 20, after the word "of," strike out "$350,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$250,000."

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this amendment is offered to bring your attention back to the recommendation of this congressional commission that had this matter in charge in 1916. I want to call your attention to the men who composed this commission. It was composed of Gen. Crozier, Chief of Ordnance of the United States Army; Gen. Joseph Strauss, Chief of Ordnance of the United States Navy; J. A. Edgerton, purchasing agent of the Post Office Department; and Francis H. Duehay, superintendent of prisons of the Department of Justice. They had this matter before them. They had an appropriation of $5,000 to bear the cost of their investigation. They made a complete investigation of this whole subject, and they recommended that this item of working capital, which you have here in this paragraph, in line 20, page 3, placed at $350,000. In their report they recommended that it be fixed at $250,000. And on that item they had something to say more at length, and I read from page 7 of their report, and I call on the majority of this House here who have furnished no information whatever to us on how they had arrived at this very question of the working capital before them.

The commission say:

The commission's engineer says that the textile plant will be required to pay out for materials 60 per cent of its annual production. On the basis of one and one-half million dollars annual production this would amount to $900,000. It is reasonable to assume that this plant will be able to turn over its raw material about once every three months. The industry should have sufficient capital to carry it along for that period, namely, $225,000. To this should be added $25,000, on account of the mail-sack manufactory—

And they say they do not want to establish the mail-sack factory—making a total capital of $250,000 for the Atlanta industries.

Now, you propose to increase this item, and I challenge the attention of the majority of this committee whether in this time of stress, in this time of collection of exorbitant taxes, to the fact that you propose to place on the taxpayers here one of these three factories that this commission recommends, at a total cost of $1,130,000. Here is what you propose to do with this one industry at Atlanta. You already appropriated $240,000 for purchase of land. Under the act of 1916 there has been appropriated $129,000 for building. You are here appropriating $650,000, under section 4, for the purchase of machinery; and $350,000 you here propose to appropriate under this section of this bill—as you intend to vote this amendment down, I know—for the working capital, making a total of the enormous sum of $1,329,000 for the establishment of this single industry in the Atlanta Penitentiary, against $695,000 that is recommended by the congressional commission appointed by this House, who, at an expenditure of $5,000, investigated the facts, or an increase in this one item, gentlemen, of $634,500 to establish a cotton-duck factory in Atlanta prison alone, to say nothing about the furniture factory that you are to establish later on over at Leavenworth, and nothing about the paper and pulp factory that you are to establish later on in the prison at McNeil Island. Because these latter two are northern industries you are throwing them out now, and spending all this money on this southern industry. What I want to challenge the attention of the majority of this committee to, and the attention of the country also to, is that you are taking war revenues that are collected here for the purpose of prosecuting this war, arming our men in the trenches, and sending them doctors and medicine, and building ships in which to carry them food, and wasting it at the rate of $1,329,000 on this single item in the very teeth and contrary to the recommendations of the commission that spent months investigating this matter, and who say, as the result of their investigation, that $695,000 is sufficient to establish this duck industry in the prison at Atlanta. If you can justify that extravagance, gentlemen, it is up to you to do so.

Mr. WEBB. I wish to say to the gentleman that it was brought out in testimony before the committee that the price of this duck is such, and that there is such a great demand for it, that this institution would pay for itself in a year and a half, and then it could be torn down, and the Government would not be out 1 cent.

Mr. ROBBINS. It was shown here by letters from gentlemen in New England, Mr. WINSLOW, and Baltimore, Mr. ZIHLMAN, that you do not need this factory at all.

Mr. WEBB. Why do not those gentlemen go down and ask for this business and get the orders?

Mr. MADDEN. Why does not the Council of National Defense answer the letters?

Mr. ROBBINS. When the Council of National Defense get letters from the private manufacturers stating that they can furnish this duck, these Government officials will not answer them. This whole scheme is a piece of useless and wasteful extravagance.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. ROBBINS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 57.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan: Page 3, at the end of line 25 add the following as a new section:

"That at the opening of each regular session of Congress the Attorney General shall make a detailed report to Congress of the receipts and expenditures made hereunder, the quantity of material of different kinds bought or otherwise acquired and used, the number of persons employed, the hours of labor and the wages paid, the amount and kind of goods manufactured and the prices paid therefor; also, the agricultural products grown or produced on land owned or cultivated by or under the direction of the Attorney General or by the authorities of said penitentiary, the amount used therein, the amount sold, the prices and total amount received therefor.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I think that is a very good amendment. I have no objection, so far as the committee is concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 5, after the word "Section," strike out the figure "6" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "5."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the committee amendment changing the number of the section is agreed to.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That said working capital shall be disbursed under the direction of the Attorney General and shall be available for the purchase, repair, or replacement of machinery or equipment, for the purchase of raw materials or parts, for the employment of necessary civilian officers and employees at the penitentiary and in Washington, for the repair and maintenance of buildings and equipment, and for all other necessary expenses in carrying out the provisions of this act.

Also, the following committee amendment was read:

Committee amendment: Page 4, line 1, after the word "Section," strike out the figure "7" and insert the figure "6."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the products of said industries shall not be disposed of except as provided in this act.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Committee amendment: Page 4, line 10, after the word "Section," strike out the figure "8" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "7."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina having this bill in charge. I wish to know if he would not accept an amendment to the effect that if the machinery and equipment can not be procured within 12 months this bill will be inoperative?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir; I could not do that.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That all laws and parts of laws to the extent that they are in conflict with this act are repealed.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 4, line 12, after the word "Section," strike out the figure "9" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "8."

The amendment was agree to.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I think under the rule it is now proper for the committee to rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina having charge of the bill that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] puts in a new section. I suggest that the gentleman ask unanimous consent——

Mr. WEBB. I think it should be at the end of the bill. The Clerk can arrange it.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee automatically rises.

Thereupon the committee rose; and Mr. KITCHIN, as Speaker pro tempore, having resumed the chair, Mr. RUBEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8938) to equip the United States Penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., for the manufacture of supplies for the use of the Government, for the compensation of prisoners for their labor, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I withhold it for the present.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I give notice, Mr. Speaker, that I shall offer a motion to recommit at the proper time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the amendments in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report the bill back forthwith with the following amendment: Page 3, line 11, after the word "fund," insert the following words: "but such rules and regulations shall under no circumstances give to the inmates of the Atlanta Penitentiary any advantage in wages or hours of labor over free labor similarly employed in Government institutions or independent manufacturing establishments."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WEBB. I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to recommit with the instructions read.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the yeas and nays. As many as favor taking the vote by yeas and nays will stand and remain standing until they are counted. [After counting.] A sufficient number have risen.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. How many rose in favor of demanding the yeas and nays?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. I think about 40.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not a sufficient number under the rules of the House.

Mr. CRISP. Under the Constitution there is required one-fifth of those present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There was more than one-fifth of those present.

Mr. BARNHART. I demand the other side, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. AUSTIN. I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of no quorum.

Mr. STAFFORD. On that I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. The yeas and nays having been demanded, the question being taken as to whether the vote was sufficient to warrant the yeas and nays, a parliamentary inquiry was made as to whether there was a sufficient number.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair declared that there was a sufficient number.

Mr. STAFFORD. And the gentleman from Wisconsin inquired of the Chair as to what that number was, and he said "40." That was not a sufficient number if there was a full membership, and then the other side was demanded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was satisfied that there was more than one-fifth of the Members present in the House.

Mr. GARNER. A point of no quorum is in order at any time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I take issue with the gentleman from Texas. If the yeas and nays are refused upon demand, it is too late to make a point of no quorum to secure a record vote on the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The yeas and nays were ordered. As many as favor the motion to recommit the bill will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay." The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 117, nays 142, answered "present" 2, not voting 169, as follows:

STATEMENT.

Senate amendment No. 1 clothes the President with authority to administer the law instead of the Secretary of Labor, as the original House bill provided. Nos. 18, 19, 21, 23, 30, 31, 32, 34, and 35 were absolutely necessary to carry into effect the change made by amendment No. 1.

Senate amendments Nos. 2, 8, 10, 12, 15, 25, and 26 were amendments striking from the bill the authority to provide "local transportation and other community facilities" in the several ways stated in the bill. Your conferees agreed to recede from the House disagreement to these several amendments with an amendment as follows: To restore the matter stricken out by the Senate amendment in each case so as to read as follows: "local transportation and other general community utilities." The original bill provided for the authority to purchase, lease, etc., "local transportation and other community facilities," and the bill as now agreed on by the conferees provides the authority to purchase, lease, etc., "local transportation and other general community utilities."

Senate amendment No. 11 provides that colleges, museums, libraries, State or municipal buildings, the furnishings in private dwellings, and occupied dwellings or places of abode shall not be taken under the powers granted in the bill except by contract, unless the necessity therefor shall be determined by the judge of a circuit or district court having jurisdiction on petition filed, due notice given, etc.

Amendment No. 16 provides that no loan under the act shall be made for less than 5 per cent per annum, and that no loan shall be made, or house or money given to anyone not an American citizen.

Amendment No. 22 strikes out the proviso to the effect that the powers authorized in the bill should not be exercised in the housing of Government employees in the District of Columbia, except upon detailed estimates and appropriations for such purpose. As the bill, in another portion, provides for detailed reports of all acts under the bill, this was not deemed necessary, and particularly when the President is to administer the law himself.

FRANK CLARK,
JOHN L. BURNETT,
R. W. AUSTIN.
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state that this report is a unanimous agreement by all the conferees.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A large number of Members have gone away with the understanding that there would be no further business following the Atlanta Penitentiary bill. I do not want to raise the question of no quorum, but I want to know if the gentleman would state that there is any urgency for the consideration of the report at this late hour.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. This matter has been pending here several days. There is absolutely no objection to the bill now on the part of anybody. I do not know of any opposition to it. The organization for carrying into effect the provisions of the bill has been practically perfected. Many persons have been engaged, and they are ready to go to work. The whole business is at a standstill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is there any reason why, if the gentleman has precedence on Monday, it can not go over?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I can not see any possible reason why it should go over. I think there is another matter of very great importance set for Monday.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it a matter of convenience to the gentleman or his committee?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. No; I do not want to put it on that ground. I will stay here as long as it is necessary. It is for the interest of the public business that the bill should be disposed of as early as possible, and, as I say, I know of no opposition to it on either side of the House.

Mr. GARNER. May I say, without the permission of the gentleman from Florida, that it would be of very great convenience to him if the matter could be agreed to to-day? It is a unanimous report of the conferees of both House and Senate, and no fundamental difference between the two Houses.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman does not mean to say that there was no opposition to it in the House?

Mr. GARNER. No; but there was a complete agreement between the conferees of the Senate and the House.

Mr. WALSH. That was between the conferees, but when it was up in the House there was opposition to it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I call for the regular order.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. AUSTIN. When the bill was disposed of in the House there were only 17 votes against it. When it went to conference Senator CURTIS, of Kansas, and myself were the two Republican members of the conference committee. There was a full, complete, and unanimous agreement on all items passed upon by the conferees, and this bill is an improvement over the bill we passed in the House.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Very much.

Mr. AUSTIN. Very much.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That bill was passed upon full hearings which had been had for a long time and available, and still there is no objection?

Mr. AUSTIN. That covered several days and were very exhaustive, and there is a pressing and immediate necessity for action on this measure. I know that from information furnished me by various Government officials.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman was a minority conferee?

Mr. AUSTIN. I was.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will he permit me to ask the gentleman from Florida in his time if the gentleman from Florida intends to briefly explain the changes which have been made?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I do not want to take any more time than is necessary.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I said "briefly," although there are two or three changes which are important.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The statement explains it and it has been read. The main point at issue was the question of who should administer the law. The House bill provided that the Secretary of Labor should administer it, and the Senate struck out the Secretary of Labor and substituted the President. The other amendments were more particularly to the frame of the bill itself with reference to the choice of words. For instance, the Senate thought that the word "otherwise" in one part of the bill should be stricken out and the word "gift" should be substituted. In that section of the bill which provided for the acquiring of property the House bill provided that we acquire by purchase, lease, requisition, condemnation, or "otherwise." The Senate took the position that there could be no other way except by gift, and they struck out the word "otherwise" and substituted the word "gift." Now, there was another proposition. The House bill provided for the acquiring of "local transportation and other community facilities." The Senate struck that out of the bill and in conference the House receded with an amendment and we made it to read, "local transportation and other general community utilities," leaving out the word "facilities," which was objected to. Now, those are the main questions which were in issue.

Mr. BURNETT. And it was also provided that there should be no private residences taken?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. BURNETT. So as to prevent the commandeering of private residences?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. In the case of private dwellings there must be court proceedings before the property is taken?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. In the case of occupied private dwellings, they could not be taken without due notice and proceedings in court and a hearing.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Private owners are protected in that respect?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. May I ask as to one other amendment. I understand that permanent as well as temporary buildings are now provided for, is that correct?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes; if the President, in his judgment, thinks it for the best interest of the Government, permanent buildings can be constructed.

Mr. RAKER. The conferees agreed to the Senate amendment, line 3, page 1, striking out "the Secretary of Labor" and putting the whole control of the bill in the hands of the President?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. When the gentleman started to make his explanation of the report, he stated that the organization had already been completed to carry out the purposes of this bill?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Practically, as I understand.

Mr. RAKER. That means that the work really will be done by the Department of Labor?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I think the President will use the organization which has been provided to carry out the purposes of the bill.

Mr. RAKER. So, as a matter of fact, the House idea and the Senate idea are practically carried out in this, and the Department of Labor will be called upon to assist the President?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Exactly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman has omitted to make mention of amendment 36, which to me seems one of the most important in the whole bill, and which I think ought to be retained:

> And all contracts to be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder, the Government reserving the right to reject any and all bids.

I think that is one of the most important in the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Yes. I want to state, Mr. Speaker, that the House provision was that the Secretary should notify and consider at least three responsible bidding contractors. The Senate amended that so as to require that the contracts should be let to the lowest responsible bidder. That was considered, and the House agreed to it. Mr. Speaker, I move that the conference report be adopted.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. DOMINICK was granted leave of absence for one week.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, May 13, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

MONDAY, May 13, 1918.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Heavenly Father, for the consolations of Thy grace. At this time of great anxiety, with the increasing burdens and distress of nations, we rejoice that we can turn to Thee and find comfort in that grace which is able to help in time of need. Thou art our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. O God, do Thou make us profoundly grateful for our exalted privileges and may we never fail to lay claim upon the provisions of Thy grace. Give us good cheer amid the world's dread frown. Give us calm composure amid the strife and tumult of nations. Give direction to all our efforts, and do Thou rule and overrule all the affairs of the nations at war for the betterment of mankind and for the extension of Thy Kingdom. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10265) to authorize the Secretary of Labor to provide housing, local transportation, and other community facilities for war needs.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8938) to equip the United States Penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., for the manufacture of supplies for the use of the Government, for the compensation of prisoners for their labor, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present a petition of citizens of Tallahassee, Fla., and also of the Orlando Board of Trade, of Florida, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the petition and resolution were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TALLAHASSEE, FLA., May 7, 1918.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, Hon. PARK TRAMMELL, Hon. WALTER KEHOE, Hon. H. J. DRANE, Hon. FRANK CLARK, Hon. W. J. SEARS,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the undersigned citizens of Tallahassee and Florida, hereby urge you to use every means within your power to oppose the passage of the following provisions in the pending naval appropriation bill, viz:

"That no part of the appropriations made in this act shall be available for the salary or pay of any officer, manager, superintendent, foreman, or other person having charge of the work of any employee of the United States Government while making or causing to be made with a stop watch or other time-measuring device a time study of any job of any such employee between the starting and completion thereof, or of the movements of any such employee while engaged upon such work; nor shall any part of the appropriations made in this act be available to pay any premiums or bonuses or cash reward to any employee in addition to his regular wages, except for suggestions resulting in improvements or economy in the operation of any Government plant."

We feel that the United States Government should be free to take any action which will speed up the work at the munitions plants, shipbuilding plants, and various industries manufacturing war materials of any and every description, and if it be necessary to stimulate production to offer any cash or other bonuses as rewards of merit and patriotism, this matter should be left entirely within the jurisdiction of the proper officials, who shall act only under the authority of President Wilson.

We deprecate any attempt, under whatever guise, to hamper or cripple the efforts of our Government at this critical time, and urge you, as true Americans, to stand by the President in this matter and to oppose any bill which carries within its provisions any power whatsoever that can lower the efficiency and retard the speed of war preparations. The honor of our country must be backed by our every dollar and our utmost personal support.

W. CLAY CRAWFORD,
Secretary of State
(And others).

THE ORLANDO BOARD OF TRADE,
Orlando, Fla., May 9, 1918.

Hon. D. U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the directors of the Board of Trade of Orlando, Fla., it was resolved that we urge upon you the necessity of defeating that provision of the pending naval appropriation bill which has for its object the nullifying of any efficiency methods affecting employees engaged on Government work, and you are hereby urged to use your best efforts to that end.

H. H. DICKSON, President.
W. S. DE WITT, Secretary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I present resolutions of the National Woman's Party of the ninth congressional district of Georgia, which they ask to have printed in the RECORD, and I ask it, also.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Whereas the women of this country are called upon to cooperate in war for democracy, and our allies, deep in this war, are enfranchising women:

Resolved, That we, in mass meeting assembled, May 2, 1918, believing in a "government of the people, by the people, and for the people," call upon you to vote in favor of the Susan B. Anthony amendment.

Mrs. W. I. HOBBS,
Chairman National Woman's Party,
Ninth Congressional District, Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I present a memorial of the Rome (Ga.) Chamber of Commerce, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution of the Rome Chamber of Commerce.

Whereas the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, assembled in its war convention in Atlantic City last September, urged as a war measure the prompt improvement of public highways; and

Whereas the transportation requirements of the country, due to the war, can be only met by complete coordination of the carrying capacities of railroads, highways, and waterways; and

Whereas there has developed in our country a tremendous increase in highway transportation for the haulage of munitions, foodstuffs, and essential supplies; and

Whereas we recognize the necessity of a Federal war-time policy in respect to highway improvement, permitting the various States to immediately formulate a definite highway program: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we urge upon the Federal Government and the several States the importance of adopting a program that will insure adequate highway construction and maintenance, so that our highways may properly carry their share of the burden of transportation; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge upon the President and the Members of Congress the creation of a centralized Federal authority to determine the highway policy of our Government, with power to determine the highway administration of that policy.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD, without reading, resolutions adopted at a meeting of De Soto Camp, United Confederate Veterans, No. 220, of Hernando, Miss., indorsing the administration.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HERNANDO, MISS., May —, 1918.

At a regular meeting of De Soto Camp, United Confederate Veterans, No. 220, May 6, 1918, the following resolution was adopted by rising vote:

We, the De Soto County Confederate veterans, in annual meeting assembled, resolved, and we do hereby reaffirm and reiterate, that we tender our services and every energy to President Woodrow Wilson in his noble and patriotic defense of our Government in the defense of right and justice of humanity, in democratic promises of freedom and liberty, against absolutism, monarchy, materialism, and atrociousness of German despotic Kaiserism.

W. L. GLENN, Commander.

Mr. THOMPSON presented a petition of the Brotherhood Sunday School Class of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Winfield, Kans., and a petition of the Commercial Association, of Winfield, Kans., praying that Congress arrange with the Governments of all the allied nations for a day of fasting and prayer, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FERNALD presented a petition of the faculty and students of Bates College, of Lewiston, Me., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COLT. I present a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations. January session, A. D. 1918. H. 866. (Mr. Peck, of Barrington.) Approved Apr. 19, 1918.]

Resolution indorsing the proposed council of States on the establishment of a definite relationship between sources of Federal and State revenues and providing for official representation therein.

Whereas at a congress of States convened at Atlanta, Ga., in connection with the Eleventh National Conference on Taxation, in November, 1917, a resolution was adopted favoring the organization of a council of States for the purpose of considering the relationship between Federal and State sources of revenue, with a view to determining what sources should be reserved for State purposes and what sources should be regarded as exclusively for the purposes of Federal Government; and

Whereas the said congress of States, with an official representation from 43 States, was convened with the sanction of the President of the United States; and

Whereas it is designed that the proposed council of States shall be convened under the authority of the State legislatures in order that its conclusions can be presented to the several States and to the Congress of the United States with the force of official authority and with better prospects for the enactment of the necessary legislation for carrying its recommendations into effect; and

Whereas the preparations for the said council of States, including the selection of a suitable date, have been placed in charge of a general committee, of which Hon. Walter E. Edge, governor of New Jersey, is chairman; Hon. Hugh Dorsey, governor of Georgia, is first vice chairman; Hon. Carl E. Milliken, governor of Maine, is second vice chairman; Edward A. Dixon, chairman of the California State Tax Commission, is treasurer-secretary; and Charles J. Tobin, secretary-treasurer of the New York State Tax Association, is assistant secretary: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island hereby respectfully urges upon the Congress of the United States and upon the legislatures of the several States the passage of the necessary legislation to insure a representation on behalf of the Federal Government and of the several States at the proposed council of States.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to appoint delegates to represent the State of Rhode Island officially at said proposed council of States.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forthwith transmitted by the secretary of State to the President of the United States, to the Members of the Congress of the United States from the State of Rhode Island, and to the chairman of the general committee.

A true copy.

Attest:

[SEAL.] J. FRED PARKER,
Secretary of State.

Mr. COLT presented resolutions adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Rhode Island, favoring the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4498) to amend section 13 of an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 438) thereon.

Mr. WEEKS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 1879) for the relief of John C. Hesse, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 439) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3410) for the relief of Charles Mace, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 72) concerning actions on account of death or personal injury within places under the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the bill (S. 4423) relating to the deposit of copyrighted books upon medical and allied subjects, reported it without amendment and submitted a report hereon.

BRIDGE IN SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 4445) granting the consent of Congress to Marion and Horry Counties, S. C., to construct a bridge across Little Peedee River, and I submit a report (No. 437) thereon. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia introduced a bill (S. 4533) to amend an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SCHOOL LAND IN SANDERS COUNTY, MONT.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, on Saturday afternoon in my absence, at the request of the esteemed Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], the Senate very kindly, by unanimous consent, took up and passed a little bill of mine to sell at their appraised value some town lots in Bowdoin, Mont., to a church organization at that place for church purposes, Senate bill 4154. I desire to express my very warm appreciation for the great kindness of the distinguished Senator from North Dakota and to the Senate as well. The most kindly action of the Senator from North Dakota is very warmly appreciated by me, as is the kindness of the Senate. I take this occasion to thank the Senators, and particularly the Senator from North Dakota. It was very good of all concerned.

The Senate was so good to me on Saturday in passing my bill for the sale of some town lots to a church that I am encouraged now to ask of it another favor—one very similar. There is a little bill on the calendar, Senate bill 933, to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent for certain land to school district No. 9 of Sanders County, Mont. The land is by existing law set aside for public purposes. The Secretary of the Interior is in favor of giving the land for school purposes, but says it requires an act of Congress to cause the land to be conveyed to the school district and to be dedicated to that particular use—education. The citizens there want to build a schoolhouse and they are ready and anxious to begin, but they can not until authority is given. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall not object to the Senator's request after the routine morning business is completed, but I must object now.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not rise to object, but I think by objecting we may go to the calendar when the morning business is closed. I hope that we may have an hour and a half for the consideration of the calendar this morning, because there is a large number of bills on the calendar similar to this one that ought to have attention.

Mr. GALLINGER. The regular order!

Mr. ASHURST. I hope this bill will go through; but I trust we may have an hour and a half for the calendar this morning after we get through with the morning business.

Mr. MYERS. I would not make my request if I thought there would be any chance for a call of the calendar this morning, but I do not believe there will be. I have given up hope of the calendar being called again this session.

COST OF AGRICULTURAL IMPLEMENTS.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I should like to call up Senate resolution 223 for completion. It is a resolution to require the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the high cost of farming implements. I have had it up twice, but certain objections were raised to some features of the resolution on the Republican side of the Chamber, which I have agreed to eliminate in order to get it passed, although I would prefer to leave the resolution as originally drawn. The resolution as amended simply states in general terms what I tried to describe specifically. If I can get the resolution up, I think it can be put to a vote and carried speedily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to taking up the resolution provided the Senator will accept the amendment I suggested.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am willing to do that to get it passed speedily, as I deem it of great importance to get the information called for as soon as possible. After conference I have agreed to the amendments suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. It is only a question of making those amendments and getting a vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not desire to object, but I wish to give notice that following the unfinished business, the Post Office appropriation bill, I shall move to take up the river and harbor bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of Senate resolution 223? The Chair hears none.

Mr. THOMPSON. I send to the desk the amendments I have agreed upon with the Senators on the other side who objected to certain provisions in the resolution. I am willing to make the amendments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the resolution be read as the Senator from Kansas proposes to amend it.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Senator from New Hampshire will observe, and also the Senator from Utah, that I have amended the resolution in accordance with my verbal agreement with them.

The Secretary proceeded to read the resolution as amended.

Mr. SMOOT. The word "manufacture" should be stricken out before "production, or supply of any of the articles enumerated."

Mr. THOMPSON. The word "manufacture" makes it plainer.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not think it will make it plainer.

Mr. THOMPSON. Production includes manufacture.

Mr. SMOOT. Then let it include it, if it does so. Let it read "prices, production, or supply of any of the articles enumerated as follows."

Mr. THOMPSON. Very well.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the resolution as proposed to be amended, which is as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed, under the authority of the act entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its purposes and duties, and for other purposes," approved September 26, 1914, to investigate and report to the Senate the cause or causes for the high prices of the articles hereinafter mentioned required to be bought and used by the farmers of the country on the farms, and to investigate and report the facts relative to the existence of any unfair methods of trade or competition by manufacturers and dealers in any of the articles hereinafter mentioned in respect to any act, combination, agreement, or conspiracy to restrict, depress, or control the prices, production, or supply of any of the articles enumerated as follows, to wit:

Agricultural implements and machinery of every kind and description.

And that the Federal Trade Commission report whether, under the facts found, the farmers are required to pay an unreasonable price for the things they are required to purchase and use on the farms in the production of food products, and whether they are thereby prevented from making a fair profit for their labor and money expended toward production.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4482) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended. The bill was unanimously reported with certain amendments by the Finance Committee of the Senate, and it is a matter of great importance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The bill ought to be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read the bill, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 11, after the word "Samoan," to strike out "armed" and insert "native," and in the same line, after the word "guard," to strike out "of the Navy" and insert "and band," so as to read:

That section 200 of the act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, as amended, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 200. That the provisions of this article shall apply to all enlisted men in the military or naval forces of the United States, except the Philippine Scouts, the insular force of the Navy, and the Samoan native guard and band."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 9, page 6, line 23, after the word "children," to strike out the numerals "$47.50" and to insert "$42.50," so as to read:

(c) if there is a widow and two children, $42.50, with $5 for each additional child up to two.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 11, page 9, after line 2, to insert:

(h) To an injured person who is totally disabled and in addition so helpless as to be in constant need of a nurse or attendant such additional sum shall be paid, but not exceeding $20 per month, as the director may deem reasonable: Provided, however, That for the loss of both feet, or both hands, or both eyes, or for becoming totally blind or helpless and permanently bedridden from causes occurring in the line of duty in the service of the United States, the rate of compensation shall be $100 per month: Provided further, That no allowance shall be made for nurse or attendant.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to the end of section 13, page 9, line 19.

Mr. SMOOT. After the section just read I move to insert, after line 9, the amendment I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, after line 19, it is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 14. That section 312 of said act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 312. That compensation under this article shall not be paid while the person is in receipt of service or retirement pay. The laws providing for gratuities or payments in the event of death in the service and existing pension laws shall not be applicable after the enactment of this amendment to any person in the active military or naval service on the 6th day of October, 1917, or who thereafter entered the active military or naval service, or to their widows, children, or their dependents, except in so far as rights under any such law have heretofore accrued."

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that the only amendment of the present law proposed by the amendment which I have offered is the insertion of the word "active" before the word "military."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I understand the amendment which is proposed by the Senator from Utah. The Committee on Finance has agreed to such an amendment, and has merely left it to the Senator from Utah to draw it. On behalf of the committee I accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. We are not yet through with the bill.

Mr. LEWIS. I want to address myself to a feature of the bill. I shall only occupy a moment of time. I merely wish to do so when it is agreeable to the Senator. I thought the Senator had concluded this bill for consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The reading of the bill has not yet been finished.

Mr. LEWIS. I understood the reading of the bill had been concluded. Am I in error?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reading of the bill has not yet been concluded.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 14, page 10, line 23, after the word "paid," to insert "and in that event the amount of the monthly installments shall be apportioned between them as may be provided by regulation," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, however, That not more than 240 of such monthly installments, including those received by such person during his total and permanent disability, shall be so paid; and in that event the amount of the monthly installments shall be apportioned between them as may be provided by regulation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 15, page 11, line 1, after the word "section," to strike out "17" and to insert "14," and in line 15, after the word "section," to strike out "17" and insert "14," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 15. That section 14 of this act amending the automatic insurance provisions of section 401 of the act approved September 2, 1914, as amended, shall be deemed to be in effect as of October 6, 1917: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to interfere with the payment of monthly installments, authorized to be made under the provisions of said section 401 as originally enacted, for the months up to and including June, 1918: Provided further, That all awards of automatic insurance under the provisions of such section 401 as originally enacted shall be revised as of the 1st day of July, 1916, in accordance with the provisions of said section 401 as amended by section 14 of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 16, page 11, line 17, after the word "effect," to strike out "on the 1st day of July, 1918," and to insert "upon and from the date of its passage, except that sections 1 to 5, both inclusive, shall take effect upon the 1st day of July, 1918," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 16. That this act shall take effect upon and from the date of its passage, except that sections 1 to 5, both inclusive, shall take effect upon the 1st day of July, 1918.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I have prepared an amendment to this measure, and had intended to press it, when I discovered that it embodies much which might occupy time this morning, and that would be rather unfair to other business.

I desire now to say that I feel this bill as now presented ought to comprehend all the employees of the Government, particularly those in shipyards, and those in munition plants, and that it should cover the employees of the Government to the same extent and with the same advantages that now apply to soldiers. I shall not press the amendment, but I will give notice that I shall tender a bill to extend this soldiers' risk insurance to all the employees of the Government. I also give notice that I shall follow that bill with a bill to extend the system to all wage earners of the United States of America, and shall present it later on the floor in full; but because of the consideration of the conference report, as well as of the desire of the Senator from Mississippi to press this particular measure at this time, I withhold the amendment which previously I had given notice that I would now present. I do so for the reasons I have stated.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ARTICLE BY CHARLES WARREN.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 10265) to authorize the Secretary of Labor to provide housing, local transportation, and other community facilities for war needs.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the New York Times yesterday contained an article from the pen of Mr. Charles Warren, formerly Assistant Attorney General of the United States, entitled "Lincoln's despotism as critics saw it in 1861." In view of the present tendency to assail the President of the United States and to object to the conferring upon him of needed war powers, a contrast is presented by this article in that it gives the experiences of Abraham Lincoln at a similar crisis in our country's history. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that the article be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator if he has looked into the matter at all to know whether it is a fair presentation of the subject?

Mr. THOMAS. I have read it with a great deal of interest. I know a good part of it to be authentic, and I have no doubt the remainder is.

Mr. GALLINGER. Some of us who lived in the days of Lincoln did not suppose he was a despot, which, I judge from what the Senator has stated, is indicated in this article.

Mr. THOMAS. Well, that is true; and yet a great many Members of Congress, both Republican and Democratic, the latter preponderating, thought so then.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes, of course; they thought a great many bad things about Lincoln.

Mr. THOMAS. As they are now thinking a great many bad things about the present President of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just one other observation. I do not know anybody who is making an attack upon the present Chief Executive. I do not discover it.

Mr. THOMAS. There have been such attacks.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are not made here; they are not made in the other House; and they are not made in the public press.

Mr. THOMAS. There have been no personal characterizations of the President up to this time, fortunately, as there were of the acts of Mr. Lincoln; but the tendency is in that direction. In any event, I regard this article at present quite opportune.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I do not object to it going in for what it is worth; but I have some doubt as to its authenticity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado?

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, May 12, 1918.]

LINCOLN'S "DESPOTISM" AS CRITICS SAW IT IN 1861—CRITICISM OF MR. WILSON'S VAST WAR POWER RECALLS ATTACK ON CIVIL WAR PRESIDENT—BLOCKADE, MARTIAL LAW, AND SEIZURE OF RAILROADS AND TELEGRAPH LINES WERE ASSAILED, BUT CONGRESS RATIFIED THEM.

(By Charles Warren, ex-Assistant Attorney General of the United States.)

[Charles Warren, the writer of this article, ceased to be Attorney General Gregory's assistant after showing active interest in Senator CHAMBERLAIN'S court-martial bill, which Mr. Wilson strongly opposed. Senator CHAMBERLAIN withdrew the bill after the President had denounced it in a letter to Senator OVERMAN.]

Frequent criticism is heard to-day of "arbitrary power" given to or asked by the President. Talk is rife of "one-man power," "dictatorship," "autocratic government," and the like.

Political memories in this country are short. Few recall that similar criticisms, charges, and attacks were made, 55 years ago, upon President Lincoln, though they were more violent and expressed in far more savage and unrestrained language.

Who now recalls that on the floor of Congress Lincoln was termed again and again "tyrant," "usurper," "despot"—as "absolute as the Czar of Russia"? Senator after Senator charged that for much less arbitrary acts kings of England and France had lost their heads. One of them termed Lincoln "the most weak and imbecile man" he had ever met. Benjamin R. Curtis, a former justice of the United States Supreme Court, described Lincoln's powers as "a military despotism." (Curtis pamphlet on Executive Power, Oct. 18, 1862.) And Joel Parker, a former chief justice of the Supreme Court of New Hampshire, wrote, November 1, 1862, that "the President is not only a monarch, but that he is an absolute, irresponsible, uncontrollable government; a perfect military despotism."

A foreign observer, Schleiden, wrote to Charles Sumner: "One of the most interesting features of the present state of things is the unlimited power exercised by the Government. Mr. Lincoln is, in that respect, the equal, if not the superior, of Louis Napoleon. The difference consists only in the fact that the President rests his authority on the unanimous consent of the people of the loyal States, the Emperor his on the army." (Rhodes's History of the United States, III, p. 442.)

WHY CONGRESS YIELDS.

The fact was (and probably always will be in time of war) that while the President then was strong with the Congress, he was stronger still with the people, and that Congress, while balking at the grant of the wide and "arbitrary" powers asked for, knew that the people demanded that Congress should back up the people.

Who now recalls that it was prophesied in the Senate that when Abraham Lincoln should go out of office "the whole country, except thieves, public plunderers, officeholders, and the tools of powers, will rejoice"?

Who now recalls that the national-bank act was attacked because it concentrated "the money power" in the hands of the President?

Who now recalls that President Lincoln was charged with either remaining purposely in ignorance or else disregarding the sentiment of the country? Yet Senator Grimes, of Iowa, wrote to Secretary Chase, July 29, 1862 (Salter's Life of James W. Grimes):

"I need not tell you that the expressions of confidence in the management of the President, his prudence, sagacity, etc., are in a measure enforced, and proceed from the confessed necessity of supporting him as the only tangible head of the loyal Government, and not from any real confidence in his wisdom. * * * It is folly to disregard the sentiment of the country in such time as this—it is worse; it is wickedness. Either Mr. Lincoln disregards it or else he willfully keeps himself in ignorance of it."

What most extreme pessimist of to-day could more despair of war conditions than did Grimes in a letter to Senator Fessenden, November 13, 1861?

"The truth is we are going to destruction as fast as imbecility, corruption, and the wheels of time can carry us: * * * the flood of corruption that is sweeping over the land and perverting the moral sense of the people. The Army is in most inextricable confusion and is every day becoming worse and worse."

POWER NOT PERPETUATED.

The following is a brief summary of congressional attacks upon President Lincoln in the Thirty-seventh Congress (1861–1863) for the "arbitrary" powers which he asked from Congress, and which he did not hesitate to exercise when necessity demanded, even without congressional legislation. Those who fear loss of American liberties at the present time may note that in a government by the people Executive power in time of war does not tend to perpetuate itself on the return of peace, for none of the direful prophecies as to the permanent results of Lincoln's acts upon the framework of our liberities were ever realized.

Four statutes gave rise to special condemnation in the Thirty-seventh Congress:

First. The railroad and telegraph act of January 31, 1862, chapter 15 (12 Stat. L., 334), by which the President was authorized to take possession of any or all the telegraph lines and railroads, and to place under military control all their officers, agents, and employees, and under which persons attempting to interfere with their use or to injure their property in places where the laws of the United States were opposed or obstructed by insurgents too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, were triable by court-martial. Under this act a military director and superintendent of railroads was appointed February 11, 1862, and 2,600 miles of railroad were operated.

Second. The confiscation act of July 17, 1862, chapter 195 (12 Stat. L., 589), by which penalties were prescribed for treason and giving aid and comfort to any rebellion, and the slaves of persons convicted were freed, and under which property of all persons giving such aid and comfort was to be confiscated.

Third. The conscription act of March 3, 1863, chapter 75 (12 Stat. L., 731).

Fourth. Suspension of the habeas corpus act of March 3, 1863, chapter 81 (12 Stat. L., 755), authorizing the President to suspend the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus and requiring discharge under certain conditions of all persons held prisoners by order of the President, Secretary of State, or Secretary of War.

In addition to opposition to these legislative measures, bitter attacks were made upon President Lincoln's censorship of the telegraph, censorship of the press, and military arrests.

CENSORSHIP IN 1861.

As early as April, 1861, the Government assumed conclusive control of telegraph lines leading from Washington, at first through the Treasury Department, later through the War Department, and finally through the State Department. By his order of July 8, 1861, the Secretary of War forbade any dispatches relative to the operations of the Army not permitted by the commanding general. By his order of October 22, 1861, the Secretary of State prescribed that all telegraphic dispatches from Washington "which relate to the civil or military operations of the Government," excepting Associated Press dispatches, should be prohibited. (See House Rept. No. 64, Mar. 20, 1862, 37th Cong., 2d sess.) By his order of February 25, 1862, the Secretary of War forbade all newspaper editors and publishers to publish any intelligence received by telegraph or otherwise respecting military operations, unless expressly authorized by the War Department or commanding generals. The newspapers were also dealt with under the fifty-seventh article of war, which was directed against "holding correspondence with, or giving intelligence to, the enemy, either directly or indirectly."

The acts of President Lincoln which occasioned the most bitter onslaughts were the arrests made under his authority, on orders from the Secretary of State and the Secretary of War, and the refusal of the military guards of prisoners so arrested to recognize writs of habeas corpus. Arrests of this nature were deemed necessary by the President at the outset of the war, and were continued until by Executive order of February 14, 1862, issued in the name of the Secretary of War, all political or State prisoners then held in military custody were ordered to be released on subscribing to a parole to render no aid or comfort to the enemy, and it was provided that "extraordinary arrests will hereafter be made under the direction of the military authorities alone." On September 24, 1862 (two days after his Emancipation Proclamation), President Lincoln, without any congressional authorization, issued a proclamation suspending the writ of habeas corpus in respect to all persons arrested by any military authority, and providing for trial by court-martial of all persons "discouraging volunteer enlistments, resisting militia drafts or guilty of any disloyal practice, affording aid and comfort to rebels against the authority of the United States."

LIMBERING UP THE GUNS.

The attacks upon the President began as soon as the Thirty-seventh Congress convened in extra session on July 4, 1861. Senate resolution No. 1 was introduced to ratify various acts of the President since the outset of the war—one of these acts being his authorization, April 27, 1861, of the commanding general to suspend the writ of habeas corpus "at any point on or in the vicinity of any military line" between Philadelphia and Washington.

Senator Kennedy, of Maryland, July 10, termed it "an exercise of arbitrary power."

Senator Polk, of Missouri, said:

"This plea of necessity is the tyrant's plea the world over, and has been in all ages the tyrant's plea for the prostration of civil liberty."

Although the actions of the President in calling out troops and increasing the size of the Regular Army, and enforcing blockades, were vigorously criticized, Congress finally confirmed them in a short statute—the act of August 6, 1861, c. 63 (12 Stat. L., 326), legalizing and making valid all the acts, proclamations, and orders of the President after March 4, 1861, "respecting the Army and Navy of the United States, or calling out or relating to the militia or volunteers from the States."

At the second session of the Thirty-seventh Congress a resolution was introduced December 16, 1861, by Senator Trumbull, of Illinois, calling upon the Secretary of State for information as to persons arrested. Senator Trumbull said: "The despot creeps upon the people unawares * * * under the plea of necessity."

Senator Grimes, of Iowa, said, January 14, 1862: "When, for the first time in six months, I attempted to approach the footstool of the power enthroned at the other end of the Avenue, I was told that the President was engaged."

In debates on the confiscation bill, which became the act of July 17, 1862, Senator Saulsbury, of Delaware, said:

"Under the pretense of suppressing a causeless rebellion, the executive and legislative departments of this Government are, in my opinion, daily engaged in the grossest violations of the fundamental law. * * * Authors and abettors of my country's ruin."

"IRRESPONSIBLE DESPOT."

Senator Wade, of Ohio, said:

"I could never justify it to the people I represent that I had sat silent while I heard it rung in my ears from morning till night that the President of the United States was by some mysterious power invested with despotic authority to trample upon the rights of the people and the rights of Congress, and that there was no barrier betwixt him and utter despotism the moment you declare war. I ask of Senators who preach this miserable, slavish doctrine where they got it."

Senator Wade also spoke of the "slavish doctrine, which is unworthy the American Senate—that the President of the United States, the moment we are involved in a war, is a despotic magistrate and is subject to no control from any quarter. * * * This attempt to magnify the President into an irresponsible despot, with power to prescribe rules and regulations by which the estates, real or personal, of men can be forfeited."

Senator Trumbull denounced the "assumption of unlimited power by the President" in appointing military governors.

At the same session Senator Powell of Kentucky introduced a resolution, April 24, 1862, asking for information from the State Department as to arrests of Kentucky citizens, speaking of them as having "languished for months in northern bastiles."

"I but simply ask that the tyrant," he said, "that the usurper who thus overthrows the Constitution and laws and violates the personal rights and takes away the liberties of citizens without law, without warrant, shall give us their names."

At the third session of the Thirty-seventh Congress (after President Lincoln had issued his proclamation of September 24, 1862, authorizing arrest by the military, and his emancipation proclamation of September 22, 1862) various bills were introduced providing for release of State prisoners, for indemnification of the President and of persons acting by his orders, and for specific authority to the President in the future to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. These bills gave rise to heated and sometimes savage debate.

At the outset of the session Senator Saulsbury, of Delaware, introduced a resolution calling on the Secretary of War for information as to the arrest of certain Delaware citizens. Senator Bayard said in debate: "We are living under just as despotic a Government as existed in France in the time of Louis XIV," and he charged the President with "gross oppression." The President's order to the Secretary of War, he said, was "nothing more than the establishment of a dictatorship in this country."

Senator Trumbull spoke of the "exercise of an arbitrary and unnecessary power."

"CABINET OF A TYRANT."

Senator Powell said that "secrecy might well become the cabinet of a tyrant, but it ill becomes the cabinet of a free, constitutional government." And he continued:

"The Senator from Maine says all this is done under the war power. * * * He resorts again to that old plea of tyrants, necessity. * * * [The President] has exercised usurped power and violated the Constitution of the country, which he has sworn to support."

Senator Saulsbury, in an elaborate speech on habeas corpus on January 8, 1863, said:

"Even the great wisdom of the framers of the Constitution could not foresee that it was possible that a man might be placed in the presidential chair in less than 80 years from the adoption of the Constitution who should so play the tyrant as to arrest peaceable citizens in States not refusing submission to the General Government and bastile them during his pleasure 'in the remotest part of the Union.' Sir, had our fathers known that such acts of intolerable oppression could be practiced in the name of liberty and would be submitted to by the people, I very believe they never would have formed the Federal Union.

"The patient and long-suffering people of this country have tamely submitted to this exercise of despotic power."

Later he said, January 27, 1863:

"Thus has it been with Mr. Lincoln—a weak and imbecile man; the weakest man that I ever knew in a high place, for I have seen him and conversed with him; and I say here, in my place in the Senate of the United States, that I never did see or converse with so weak and imbecile a man as Abraham Lincoln, President of the United States. * * *

"[This bill] proposes to legalize the most despotic exercise of power that was ever practiced in any Government since the institution of human society. Talk not to me about lettres de cachet; talk not to me about the espionage of Napoleon; talk not to me about any of the arbitrary exercises of despotic power in this country * * *; they are all buried beneath the wave of oblivion in comparison to what this man of yesterday, this Abraham Lincoln, that neither you nor I ever heard of four years ago, has chosen to exercise. * * * If I wanted to paint a despot, a man perfectly regardless of every constitutional right of the people, whose sworn servant, not ruler, he is, I would paint the hideous form of Abraham Lincoln. If that be treason"——

LINCOLN AS CONJURER.

Senator Davis said that the President was "trying to conjure up out of a thing so insignificant and evanescent as military necessity, of which I have not been able to find a single word in any book, a power as gigantic and quite as atrocious as the rebellion itself * * * myrmidons of the palace and war offices * * * expenses of all their nefarious service. Under the orders of Mr. Lincoln and his Secretary of War this lawless organization has boldly and contemptuously trampled under foot the writ of habeas corpus and the laws and the Constitution both of States and of the United States."

Senator Bayard said that the habeas corpus bill, which became the act of March 3, 1863 (c. 81, 12 Stat., 755), was "a sheer lawless despotism and no more, a despotism unequaled in the annals of the world, unless you go to the King of Dahomey for an example." * * * Senator Powell reechoed this, saying: "You propose to clothe the President with a power that will make him as absolute a despot as the Czar of Russia ever was."

Senator Wall, of New Jersey, said March 2, 1863: "I look upon this bill as fraught in its consequences with more terrible mischief to the best interests of this country than any of the dangerous projects that have sprung, like Minerva, but without her wisdom, full armed from the busy brain of the chairman of the Military Committee. * * * This bill clothes the President of the United States, with the aid of the conscription bill passed on Sunday morning, with the panoply of the vast powers and functions of a dictator. The dictator, who in the hour of a nation's peril came forth from the Roman Senate with absolute will over the life, liberty, and property of the Roman citizen, never had any more power than this bill confers upon the President of the United States."

PLEA FOR IMPEACHMENT.

Senator Powell stated that Lincoln should be impeached, and made the following prophecy that the country would rejoice when his term of office ended: "Why, sir, these gentlemen go on as if they were absolute monarchs forever. Is it not true that the power of these men is of very brief duration? In two years and two days more Abraham Lincoln will go out of office; and I have no doubt the whole country, except thieves, public plunderers, officeholders, and the tools of power, will rejoice when the day shall arrive. * * * Why, sir, for one-tenth of the infractions of the constitution of the British Empire that Abraham Lincoln and those who are at the head of the departments of this Government have inflicted upon this Constitution of ours, one British King lost his head and another was sent a wanderer and an exile from his home and his throne."

In the House the most extreme attack upon Lincoln was made by Congressman Voorhees, of Indiana, February 18, 1863. He spoke of the President's proclamation of September 24, 1862, as to martial law, as "the unblushing assumption of power which has ceased to respect or fear the Constitution or laws. * * * It throws aside all disguise, tears off its veil, and displays the horrible features of despotism to American citizens. * * * The nineteenth century and the land of much-vaunted freedom have produced a President and Cabinet who, in a species of delirium, have defied, spurned, and sought to crush and humiliate the legal decisions of centuries made in behalf of personal liberty and personal independence. * * *

"In defiance of all law, in contempt of the judiciary, in derision of the teachings of history, and in scorn and mockery of the holy principles of personal liberty, the writ of habeas corpus stands suspended. The will of the Executive has for more than a year been the sole law of the land to which the outraged citizen has been permitted to appeal. * * *"

On the militia law (S. 493) Senator Richardson, of Illinois, said February 4, 1863:

"No bill has ever been introduced into Congress of such fearful import as the one now under consideration. It confers upon the President of the United States power to make all rules and regulations for the enrollment of the militia. * * * This bill proposes * * * to confer upon the President of the United States more power than belongs to any despot in Europe or anywhere else. * * *"

The conscription bill (which became the act of Mar. 3, 1863) was also the subject of violent attack because of the arbitrary powers which it placed in the hands of the President.

TO ENSLAVE THE NATION.

Senator Saulsbury said February 28, 1863: "I regard this measure as the crowning act which gives to the Executive of this Nation the power to enslave the entire body of the citizens of this land. * * * The bleeding, mangled body of the Constitution of your country lies in your pathway. * * * Surrender no other liberty or right which the American citizen has to the absolute will of any man."

Senator Kennedy, of Maryland, said: "I regret that I stand in the midst of the ruins of the Republic. * * * As to the bill itself, I look upon it as odious and despotic. It goes further to subjugate the people of a free country than any I have ever read of in history or known in the present day."

Congressman Biddle, of Pennsylvania, February 23, 1863, said that the conscription bill was "part of a series of measures which, to my mind, seem materially to alter the structure of the Government under which we live."

Congressman Cox, of Ohio, said:

"Never in the history of this or any other government has such a stupendous power been reposed in one man as the power reposed by this bill in the President of the United States. It makes this Government * * * an irresponsible despotism, worse than that of France and more tyrannical than that of Russia. You have already given to this administration the purse; you now throw the sword into the scale, and nothing is left to the people but abject submission or resistance. * * * For my part, sir, I do not trust the present Chief Magistrate."

The reference to the "purse" and the "sword" recalls the fact that the act establishing the national banking system (act of Feb. 25, 1863; 12 Stats. L., 665) at this same session of Congress, was subjected to frequent attack because of its centralization of power in the Executive.

BANKING AND WAR.

Senator Powell, of Kentucky, on February 10, 1863, said of the bank act: "It is a grand scheme of consolidation; one that, in my judgment, will become dangerous to the public liberties."

Senator Collamer, of Vermont, on February 11, 1863, said that the bill was not a war measure:

"I have observed that almost everything that is asked for * * * is put upon that ground; it is either a military necessity or a political necessity, or you can not keep the Union together without it, or something of that kind, by which we are appealed to to let our conscience and our discernment go and obey the dictates pressed upon us. If it has come to this, that it is to be more than intimated that we are not to consult our understandings, not to indulge ourselves in reasoning about a matter, but we are to be told ex cathedra by the organ of the administration that the Cabinet desires and are all in favor of a certain thing as an argument to induce us to cave into, it seems to me that implies a degree of subserviency that can hardly be expected."

Senator Davis said, February 11, 1863, "Against such a union of the power of the purse and the sword I will enter my protest, at least. I think it is the most dangerous scheme of policy that was ever introduced into any deliberative assembly."

Congressman Steele, of New York, in the House February 23, 1863, also attacked the centralizing of power, and said that by the national-bank act "the whole currency of the country is to be placed in the hands of the Executive department, * * * a mammoth institution, with its thousands of tributaries scattered over the whole country, all under the control of the Executive department."

WHITE HOUSE SENTINELS.

As an example of the extremes to which Senators were willing to go, it may be noted that Senator Richardson, of Illinois, February 28, 1863, attacked the employment of sentinels around the White House and War Department, saying:

"These emblems of regal power, placed there to familiarize our people with them, filled me with sorrow and sadness. For the first time in our history these things have occurred. Washington had no sentinel while President. Adams had none, Jefferson none. * * * The ruins of this Republic will be scattered along the highway of nations where lie the ruins of all the republics that have gone before us."

LINCOLN OR JEFF DAVIS?

And Senator Davis said, on the same day, "Such have been the infractions of the Constitution and the oppressive abuses and the usurpations of power, both by the President and his party in Congress, that a large majority of the Union people of America are at a loss to determine which threatens the greatest evil, the administration of Jeff Davis or Abraham Lincoln."

Senator Nesmith, of Oregon, spoke, February 4, 1862, of "the imbecility and inefficiency of the head of this Government."

While sustaining attacks of this nature, President Lincoln was confronted on the other hand with a certain degree of criticism from some of his own supporters, who expressed their belief that our President, so far from being a "despot," had not been vigorous enough in his treatment of the war, of the enemy, and of those who were giving aid and comfort to the enemy. To point the moral in this direction, Senator Doolittle, of Wisconsin, May 2, 1862, narrated the following striking anecdote of Andrew Jackson:

"I have been told upon authority upon which I rely that during the last days of Gen. Jackson at the Hermitage, as he was slowly sinking under the ravages of consumption—that mysterious disease which, while it wastes the body, leaves, if possible, the mind more clear and more near to inspiration—he had a most remarkable conversation with his family physician and friend. While lying upon his bed one day and speaking of his past administration, he inquired: 'What act of my administration, in your opinion, will posterity condemn with the greatest severity?'

"The physician replied that he was unable to answer; it might be the removal of the deposits. 'Oh, no,' said the general.

"'Then, it may be the specie circular.'

"'Not at all.'

"'What is it, then?'

"'I can tell you,' said he, rising in his bed, his eye kindling up. 'I can tell you; posterity will condemn me more because I was persuaded not to try and hang John C. Calhoun as a traitor than for any other act of my life.'"

As early as the debate on July 11, 1861, Senator Lane, of Indiana, stated that the Government had shown "great forbearance."

Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, December 16, 1861, thus defended the arrests of persons who were holding "secret conclaves" and "peace meetings" after the Union defeat at Bull Run, "giving aid and comfort" to the enemy:

"In Northern cities and villages newspaper presses were publishing treason, proclaiming treasonable purpose, encouraging the rebellion. The Government thought it was necessary, and it laid its hands on the conductors of these presses. * * *

"The President of the United States, through his head clerk, the Secretary of State, had these persons arrested; and, sir, the turning of the doors of Fort Lafayette and Fort Warren upon their hinges silenced the innumerable traitors in the loyal States of the Union. They are silent to-day, but they are silent through fear. * * *

"There has been quite too much * * * kindness of heart in this war, quite too much charity, and it is time that sterner and more determined action should be had both in the civil and military power of the country."

And in the debate on the House bill (H. R. 362) to discharge State prisoners, Wilson again said, July 16, 1862, that the Government had acted with more humanity than any Government had ever done, "too leniently."

ARRESTS NECESSARY.

Senator Doolittle, of Wisconsin, said, December 8, 1862, that the Government "has been too lenient toward men who have been notoriously engaged, in sympathy and in act, too, with the traitors against the Government; and the complaint has been, not because suspected persons have been arrested, but because the guilty have not been shot or hung; that the prison door has been opened too easily to many of these men."

Senator Field, of New Jersey, said the suspension of the writ in Maryland absolutely saved the State to the Union and that the Government had erred, if at all, on the side of leniency.

Earnest defense of the President's alleged "arbitrary" acts was made on the ground that in time of urgent necessity individual rights must sometimes be sacrificed to preserve the country.

Senator Nesmith, of Oregon, said: "I am not ignorant of the sacredness of personal liberty; but I think this Government, this Constitution, this Union, are paramount to all other considerations, and I think their preservation is far above the personal liberty of any single individual or any 50 individuals."

Senator Morrill, of Vermont, said, December 11, 1862: "The President is charged as a violator of the Constitution and the laws—a usurper.

"It is the right and bounden duty of the President to put his hands upon whoever sympathizes or whoever gives aid or comfort to the rebels."

Senator Fessenden, of Maine, said, December 11, 1862, that it was the duty of the President to sacrifice individual rights to due process and liberty for a time if necessary to preserve the Constitution itself. And that, though the President may have exceeded his powers or made mistakes, there has been no case in which he had acted wantonly or to wreak private malice.

MORAL TREASON.

Senator Dixon, of Connecticut, December 16, 1861, in upholding the President's arrests, said that if he, the President, had not pursued this course he would have been guilty of "moral treason." He referred to the arrest of various Connecticut citizens who had been holding "falsely called 'peace meetings,'" and continued:

"It is enough for me to know that the public safety demands extraordinary powers, vested in and exercised by the Executive; and I shall not embarrass his bold and patriotic actions by any nicely balanced scruples or subtle distinctions. * * * In my judgment he has erred, if at all, on the side of lenity and indulgence." * * *

Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, February 21, 1863, speaking of men whom he described as "tainted with the leprosy of moral treason," said that "the denunciations of the President as tyrant and usurper * * * raise cheers of triumph around rebel camp fires."

Senator Browning, of Illinois, said December 16, 1862, that war should be made on the enemy and not on the Executive:

"If he [the President] becomes, as he is charged with having become, a usurper; if he becomes a tyrant; if he uses this constitutional power as a mere pretext for oppression, his judgment is not an ultimate one. When the appropriate time comes we can investigate his conduct and punish his derelictions; but this is not the appropriate time. Let us now concentrate our efforts against the rebels; let us fight them; let it not go to the country that we have ceased to make war upon them and have turned our batteries upon a coordinate department of the Government. When we do that we become the aiders and abettors of treason and we give aid and comfort to rebellion everywhere."

The futility and unfairness of criticism upon the President in time of war was most eloquently set forth in a striking and little-known speech by Representative Riddle, of Ohio, in the House February 28, 1863, a part of which is as follows:

"How easy it is to abuse, traduce, and denounce! Sir, the Executive is the arm of the people under our Constitution, and with it only can we deal a blow upon the rebellion. * * * Whoever strengthens this arm strengthens the national cause; whoever weakens it strengthens the enemy. For the time being the other branches of the Government might well be in abeyance, that all our energies might go to swell the mighty muscles of that arm. To save all, all must be risked. You can not separate the Executive from the personale of the President; and whatever detracts from him personally weakens the Executive force, as whatever elevates him gives it added strength. So that whatever shakes the confidence of the people, or any of them, in the capacity or integrity of the President by just so much aids the rebellion, as that which strengthens confidence in him gives vigor to the national cause."

THE NEED OF FAITH.

And Riddle pointed out the necessity of faith by the people in the man, Lincoln, in the following remarkable depiction:

"He may not have in excess that ecstatic fire that makes poets and prophets and madmen; he may not possess much of what we call heroic blood that drives men to stake priceless destinies on desperate ventures and lose them; he may not, in an eminent degree, possess that indefinable something that schoolboys call genius, that enables its possessor through new and unheard-of combinations to grasp at wonderful results and that usually ends in failure; or if he possesses any or all of these qualities they are abashed and subdued in the presence of a danger that dwarfs giants and teaches prudence to temerity. He is an unimpassioned, cool, shrewd, sagacious, far-seeing man, with a capacity to form his own judgments and a will to execute them; and he possesses an integrity pure and simple as the white rays of light that play about the throne."

Finally there may be cited as intensely pertinent to the impatient mood of the country to-day the following remarks of Senator Grimes, February 17, 1863, as to his view of the requisite power and the corresponding responsibility of the President of the United States in time of war:

"I am aware that this bill confers extraordinary powers upon the President. It grants no power, however, that I am not anxious to bestow upon him. I wish to confer upon him ample means to restore the Union and to defend the national honor abroad, and I will hold him and his immediate constitutional advisers responsible for the manner in which that power shall be exercised."

On the same patriotic lines were Senator Sherman's remarks in the Senate on February 5, 1863, when he said:

"We do no good to our cause, no good to our country, by a constant crimination of the President, by arraigning him here, as I have heard him arraigned, as a tyrant and an imbecile. * * * If we allow his authority to be subdued and overrun, we destroy the authority of the Government of the United States."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SWANSON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In connection with the introduction of matter of the sort presented by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] for insertion in the RECORD, I, and I think a good many other Senators, were informed, some time ago to be sure, that an agreement of some sort had been reached to prevent the crowding of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD with matter not having anything to do with the proceedings of the Senate and not forming a part of the remarks of any Senator. In accordance with my understanding of that agreement, which has been repeated to me on many occasions, and upon which I have consulted other Senators, I have from time to time informed constituents of mine that it was impossible to obtain the printing in the RECORD of matter which they had sent to me—newspaper articles, magazine articles, and resolutions adopted by societies and organizations of which they are members. It seems that that understanding, which certainly existed here, has been abandoned and thrown to the winds. A Senator may rise now and introduce into the RECORD an entire page from a Sunday newspaper.

Mr. THOMAS. Not quite.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If it had been an entire page, Mr. President, I imagine there would have been no more objection than there has been upon this occasion.

I do not want to throw monkey wrenches into the cylinder or be classed as an objector, even a conscientious objector on a matter of this sort, but I think, Mr. President, this practice should cease. Extraneous matter takes up a tremendous space in the RECORD; it is seldom, if ever, read by Senators. I venture to say that not more than a dozen Senators will read the matter inserted in the RECORD at the request of the Senator from Colorado. They are too busy to read that kind of stuff, important though it may be in an academic sense. In the future I hope that those who guide the Senate in a sense with respect to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and its contents will insist upon the agreement which was reached early in this session and prevent the introduction of such matter into the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator before he takes his seat when the agreement to which he refers was made? I have no recollection of an agreement, and I certainly do not want to be put in the attitude of even seemingly transgressing an agreement of the Senate upon any subject.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was an agreement made by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH]——

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not with Members of the Senate but with members of his committee, I think.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Arizona served notice upon the Senate that he would be in his seat to object to everything of this sort. He has not been very diligent in his attendance since then, because he is suffering from ill health.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that the Committee on Printing of the Senate and also the Committee on Printing of the other House have held meetings a number of times in regard to this question. It comes up sporadically every month or so, and everything is excluded from the RECORD in the shape of newspaper and magazine articles. Then the agitation generally dies down, and one article slips into the RECORD one day without notice, the next day another one follows, and so forth. I should like to see the Senate on some occasion express themselves as to whether they want newspaper or magazine articles to appear in the RECORD. If the Senate will express themselves as opposed to that practice, then I assure the Senate that there will be no more newspaper articles go into the RECORD while I am in the Chamber, and that is generally from the time the Senate convenes until it adjourns.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to ask the Senator if he means by that that he would prevent his associates from reading articles into the RECORD?

Mr. SMOOT. I could not do that; but I think that the Senate would correct that sooner or later. I do not believe that there are many Senators who will undertake to do that many times. I do know, however, Mr. President, that this practice ought to be stopped. The paper bill of the Government in 1916 was $917,000, while for 1917 it was nearly $5,000,000; and, Mr. President, at a later day, I hope within a very few days, I am going to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to how and where this extra paper has been used.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SWANSON. I must insist on the consideration of the conference report on the housing bill.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. SWANSON. I will yield for a few minutes more.

Mr. BORAH. I merely wanted to ask the Senator a question; that is all. Do I understand the Senator to say that the paper bill was nine hundred and some odd thousand dollars in 1916?

Mr. SMOOT. The paper purchased for the Government of the United States in 1916 cost $917,000, whereas for 1917 it cost nearly $5,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean that that is by reason of the increase in the size of the RECORD?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not mean that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or because of publications made at the instance of Senators?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not so intimate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I know the Senator did not mean to do so, and yet in this connection I think the statement ought to be made lest a false impression might go out to the country.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought my statement that followed what I said in regard to the paper bill, namely, that I intended in a very few days to show how that increase had been occasioned.

THE LIBERTY MOTOR.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have here a letter from Mr. Leon Cammen, who is a member of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, of the Aeronautical Society of America, of the New York Academy of Sciences, and of the Society of Automotive Engineers. I do not know the gentleman, but he writes me the letter. It is a criticism or a disquisition with relation to the Liberty motor. I will not take the time of the Senate to ask to have the letter read, but I should like to have it printed in the RECORD, and I should like to have it printed in brevier type, so that it can be more easily read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

29 WEST THIRTY-NINTH STREET,
New York, May 12, 1918.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE, of Connecticut,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BRANDEGEE: There has appeared to-day in all newspapers a statement made before the Senate with respect to the Liberty motor in the Bristol plane, of great significance as throwing a vivid light on the entire subject of this unfortunate adventure in engineering design.

It is stated that the motor overheats; to a layman this means next to nothing; to an engineer it tells a big story, and raises questions pregnant with importance.

These questions are:

(1) Does this overheating indicate a basic defectiveness of design, or can it be corrected by some expedient?

(2) Why was it not discovered on the testing stand long before the motor was put into the Bristol machine, and was it not due to improper methods of testing the motor?

I shall try and answer these questions in their order. First, the overheating indicates that the design of the motor as it stands is incorrect. The following calculation will prove it (I venture to submit it so that you might have your own engineers pass upon it):

Nearly half a century ago the great physicists, Dr. Joule and Lord Melvin, have shown that a certain number of heat units has to be consumed in an engine in order that the engine should produce a certain amount of power. Thus, to produce one horsepower (1 hr.) output the engine has to consume roughly 42.5 B. t. u. (British thermal units) per minute.

If we had an engine working at 100 per cent efficiency, without any losses, we could produce a horsepower output on 42.5 of heat, and then would have no need for any radiators. Unfortunately, we can not yet do it, and about the best that a large high-speed gasoline engine can do in a long run is to work on about 20 per cent efficiency; that is, to employ usefully only 20 per cent of the heat developed in the cylinders, and lose the rest in various ways. This means that in order to produce a mechanical output of 1 horsepower the engine, if of good design and in perfect condition, develops in the cylinders not 42.5 British thermal units, but five times as much, or say 212.5 British thermal units. Of this amount 42.5 units are usefully converted into power, and the rest is lost in various ways, such as internal frictions, exhaust, to cooling water, and so forth.

The cooling-water loss is what interests us now, since, after all, the radiator has to dissipate the heat lost from the cylinders to the cooling water. In a well-designed high-speed engine the loss to the cooling water should not exceed 30 per cent (all these figures are based on reliable tests by independent engineers of the highest standing), and 30 per cent of 212.5 British thermal units means 63.65 British thermal units.

Sixty-three and sixty-five one-hundredths British thermal units per horsepower per minute is the amount which a properly designed engine should lose to the cooling water, and this is the amount which the radiator has to take care of. This is also the amount for which the radiator in the original Bristol machine was designed. Now, let us see what happens in a machine not properly designed. It does not take much to throw out this calculation.

Assume that the motor works at 16 per cent, instead of 20, efficiency. Then to develop 1 horsepower 265 British thermal units of heat have to be produced in the cylinders of the engine. Assume further that instead of a loss of 30 per cent 35 per cent are lost to the cooling water, as is the case with some aeroplanes and a good many automobile motors on the market. This means that 92.75 British thermal units will be lost to the cooling water per horsepower minute, and that it will be this amount that the radiator has to dissipate.

Now, please compare the amount of needful radiation (per horsepower minute):

In good engines, 63.65 British thermal units.

In inferior engines, 92.75 British thermal units.

Whether the figures given for the second case apply to the Liberty engine in toto, I do not know, as "Liberty engine" is a very generic term which applies to nearly every engine that the Signal Corps is experimenting with, and covers about as many types as there are sins in the calendar. But these figures do explain why the radiation is not sufficient, because it was designed for an engine more efficient and better designed than the Liberty motor which was tried with it. And this is the big lesson.

But you may ask, in nontechnical language, is it such a very serious thing. Why not put on the plane a bigger radiator? It can, and may, be done, but with very disastrous results from a military point of view.

In the first place, employment of a bigger radiator (in this case, about 50 per cent) changes the distribution of weight in the plane, and hence requires an entire change in the design of the plane, and it is very likely that if this were done it would be found that the power delivered by the engine is insufficient. Besides, such a basic change of the Bristol plane would require many months of work and experimentation, and in the meantime, What?

Next, a radiator 50 per cent bigger than the present one would at a speed of 90 miles per hour increase the power consumption roughly by more than 75 per cent. I have not had time to make the exact computation, but you will find the proper formula in my paper before the Society of Automobile Engineers, December, 1915, Bulletin.

Second question: Why was not the fact that the Liberty motor needs more radiation than the Bristol plane can give discovered long before the engine was put into the plane?

This is a fact which could have been very easily established in any decent laboratory, with such equipment as any gas engineer ought to know how to use. In fact, tests of this nature are being carried out as day's work by automobile, and especially tractor, engineers all over the country.

Why was it not done in this case? Because the standard test adopted for aeroplane engines by the Society of Automotive Engineers, and presumably used by the Government engineers (the Society of Automotive Engineers repeatedly advertised its collaboration with the Government in the working out of their standards), is designed so as to make the discovery of this particular fact impossible.

The Society of Automotive Engineers standard test for aeroplane engines permits to make cooling water adjustments in the course of the test; that is, to test the engine under conditions very materially different from those in actual flight when, of course, no such adjustments are possible.

That a test in which "adjustments" of this kind are permitted will lead to grief in actual flights ought to be clear to any unprejudiced person. It is unfortunate for our fighting prospects that in the production of aircraft engineering methods are permitted which would not be tolerated in the manufacture of milk bottles. (This comparison with milk bottles is used advisedly, as a cold fact, and not as a rhetoric form of speech.)

May I add that as an engineer I am deeply sorry that the entire matter of the Liberty motor and plane production is being handled as a political question of veracity between various individuals instead of as a matter of technical records and tests. This can be done very easily, and the whole matter disposed of in not more than three days.

Respectfully,

L. CAMMEN.

HOUSING OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 10265, known as the housing bill.

Mr. LODGE. Let it be read, and let us see what it is about.

Mr. SWANSON. It was printed a week ago.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the report be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. CLAUDE A. SWANSON,
JAS. A. REED,
CHARLES CURTIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

FRANK CLARK,
JOHN L. BURNETT,
R. W. AUSTIN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On May 10, 1918:

S. 3803. An act authorizing the President during the existing emergency to sell supplies, materials, equipment, or other property, heretofore or hereafter purchased, acquired, or manufactured by the United States, in connection with, or incidental to, the prosecution of the war; and

S. 4208. An act authorizing postage rates on aeroplane mail.

On May 11, 1918:

S. 1545. An act to amend the act of March 3, 1913, entitled "An act to regulate the officering and manning of vessels subject to the inspection laws of the United States."

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not know whether I am in order or not, but I wish to ask the indulgence of the Senate for an hour this morning to take up the calendar. A large number of Senators have bills on the calendar that they wish to have brought before the Senate and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has been trying to close the morning business. The Chair does not know just what is the matter. For two or three weeks it seems to have been impossible to close the morning business.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, understanding that the morning business is about to close, if not formally declared closed, I renew my request for unanimous consent to consider immediately Senate bill 933. It is to enable a school district in Sanders County, Mont., to build a schoolhouse on a block of public land in the town of Dixon. The people there are very anxious to build it this summer. The bill passed the Senate at the last Congress, but did not get through the House. The bill is favorably recommended by the Secretary of the Interior and by the Senate Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I do not want to object, but that is the very vice of the thing. Senators rise and ask unanimous consent here and over there, and that prevents the calendar from being called.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it is impossible to hear what is being said.

Mr. MYERS. The calendar will not be called. There is no way of having it called.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any further morning business? [A pause.] The morning business is closed.

CONVICT-MADE GOODS.

H. R. 8938, an act to equip the United States Penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., for the manufacture of supplies for the use of the Government, for the compensation of prisoners for their labor, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in the House that bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee. I therefore move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate unless the Senator objects.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not very particular, Mr. President. I should like to read it before the reference is determined upon, and I will agree with the Senator from North Carolina as to which committee it ought to go to. I should give attention to it in either committee. It is not necessary to decide the matter at once.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that it go over.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And have the assignment made to-morrow? That is perfectly satisfactory to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is perfectly easy to make a motion to refer the bill to some committee. The Chair has referred it to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, Mr. President, I will confer with the Senator from North Carolina; and if we agree that the bill ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary, I will move to reconsider the reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is perfectly easy to send it there.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas will state it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to ask what action was taken on the request for unanimous consent made by the Senator from Montana?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not been preferred since the closing of the morning business.

SCHOOL LANDS IN SANDERS COUNTY, MONT.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I renew my request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. What is the request?

Mr. GALLINGER. What is before the Senate, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request of the Senator from Montana to take up a bill, the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 933) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent for certain land to school district numbered 9, of Sanders County, Mont.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, upon proper application, to issue patent to school district No. 9, of Sanders County, Mont., for block 8, designated as "Public reserve," upon the approved plat of the town site of Dixon, Mont., provided that title to the land so granted shall revert to the United States if the said school district attempts to alienate or use the land for other than school purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Montana why this municipality, whatever municipality it may be, does not purchase a site for a schoolhouse?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, the town is not incorporated. It is only a village. The town site is on public land, embraced in the Flathead reclamation project. The town site was laid out on public land in accordance with the law which provided for certain town sites being laid out on the Flathead reclamation project. In every town site on the project a block was reserved by law for public purposes, and it was intended for whatever purpose the community might desire to put it to; but the Secretary of the Interior holds that it can not be put to the particular purpose of building a school upon it unless Congress so directs. There is no other purpose to which this particular block could be put. The town is not a county seat and does not need a courthouse, but does need a good school building. Practically all the vacant land of the town site is owned by the Government. There is no opportunity to purchase. The real intent was to put aside one block in every town site for a courthouse, schoolhouse, or whatever use of a public nature the people of the community might indicate, and they need a schoolhouse there very badly. This building site is the only one available.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is there a provision of the statute that certain lands shall be appropriated for that purpose?

Mr. MYERS. Oh, yes. The general statute set aside one block in each town site for whatever public purpose the people might prefer.

Mr. GALLINGER. The thing that has been troubling me is this: I am not going to be factious about anything that our western friends want, but I am pretty rapidly coming to the conclusion that about the only relief we will get will be to turn over the public lands to the States and let them do with them what they please. We are picking them away day by day, favoring certain States and not others, and giving away the public lands. But this is a small matter, and if it will tend to educate the people of that community I certainly shall not object to it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. I think it is proper to state to the Senator, in order that he may understand just what this is, that there is general town-site law applicable to all the public land in all of the public-land States in the entire United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. FALL. They are all in exactly the same condition. The law provides for town sites which may be taken up on the public domain. This is an effort to get from under the general provisions of the law with reference to a certain town site in a certain district in the State of Montana.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thought likely something of that kind was at the bottom of it.

Mr. FALL. The suggestion that the Senator made, of course, strikes very favorably those of us who are compelled, in the public-land States, to labor under the difficulties of attempting to make general legislation applicable to a particular condition. If the lands were turned over to the States under restrictive legislation that Congress might see fit to pass, the local people, understanding those conditions, would understand how to administer the law.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4185. In order that Senators may understand what it is, I will state that this is the bill recommended by Secretary Lane to authorize a small appropriation to the Bureau of Education to cooperate with the States in an effort now being made to teach English everywhere and to remove illiteracy. The appropriation for the first year is only $100,000, and $50,000 for the next two years.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to be heard. I happen to be a member of the committee that reported this bill, and I wish to pay my tribute of respect and admiration to the Senator from Georgia, the chairman of the committee. I think it is a very worthy bill and it ought to pass; but this only emphasizes, I repeat, the vice of the situation in respect to the calendar. The esteemed Senator on my right [Mr. MYERS] has a bill, and it is passed by unanimous consent, and he loses interest in promoting the calling of the calendar.

Mr. MYERS. Oh, Mr. President, I have not lost interest——

Mr. ASHURST. I do not yield. The esteemed Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has a bill which ought to pass. He gets unanimous consent and that is passed, and he loses his interest in promoting the calling of the calendar. Another Senator has a bill and it is passed by unanimous consent, with the same result; and those of us who never ask unanimous consent do not get an opportunity to have our bills considered. If I may be pardoned for a personal reference, I never have asked unanimous consent but once, and I am sorry that I asked that, since I have been a Member of the Senate.

The way we ought to do is, when the hour of 1 o'clock arrives, or when the morning business is closed, to call the calendar. While I shall not object to the consideration of the bill for which the Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent, I do think the practice is a bad one. Let us finish the morning business and then call the calendar.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I beg to say that I have not lost my interest in calling the calendar. I have on the calendar a large number of other bills which are very important to the State of Montana, and I should like to have the calendar called. If I had thought the calendar would be called soon, I would not have made the request that I made this morning. However, I have no faith in the calendar being called. I do not expect it to be called soon, and think probably no more this session. I have been making earnest efforts to have it called, but without success.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. The motion is not debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not debatable until the morning business is closed, or until the hour of 1 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me to make a statement, by unanimous consent we have already discussed this bill. I think we are through with the discussion of it. I want to say to the Senator from New Hampshire that I am going to take off one more year and leave it until 1920, so that it will be running through the immediate war period; and I hope he, too, will support it now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 4185, the title of which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 4185) to require the Commissioner of Education to devise methods and promote plans for the elimination of adult illiteracy in the United States.

On a division the motion was lost.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

REGISTRATION FOR MILITARY SERVICE—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present a conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon Senate joint resolution 124, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The report was read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the House insert: "and all male persons." Also amend the title by striking out the word "or" in line 2 and insert in lieu thereof: "and all male persons"; and the House agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the House and insert the following: "Provided, That students who are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and students who are preparing for the practice of medicine and surgery in recognized medical schools, at the time of the approval of this act shall be exempt from the selective draft prescribed in the act of May 18, 1917"; and the House agree to the same.

GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN,
G. M. HITCHCOCK,
F. E. WARREN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

S. HUBERT DENT, Jr.,
W. J. FIELDS,
JULIUS KAHN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the report been printed?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will state that Senate joint resolution 124 passed the Senate and went to the House, and the House amended it by striking out that portion of the joint resolution which exempted from the draft medical students and divinity students. It went into conference, and we agreed in conference, but when it went back to the House they disagreed to the report and asked for another conference, which we have had, and this is a full agreement.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the report still strike out medical students?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It leaves in divinity students and medical students who have now matriculated and strikes out the provision which exempted from registration and draft those who might enter these schools during the war.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, I do not wish at all to delay the adoption of the conference report, but I think, in view of the situation that confronts some of the States, particularly the State of California, a few observations upon the mode of levying the next quota in the draft may not be inappropriate.

What I wish particularly to call to the attention of the Senate and to the attention of the country is what I think is the inequitable mode that has now been determined upon embraced in this conference report, and which has received the sanction of the President, the Secretary of War, and the Provost Marshal General.

It is very strenuously insisted in the State of California and in many other States that in making up the quota for the next draft credit should be allowed for all the enlistments that have been made in our State, and indeed in all the States. The Senate will recall and our people will remember, of course, that when the draft went into operation contemporaneously with it the Government asked for voluntary enlistment. I remember at that time the posters in this city during the time when we were administering the draft:

Be a went,
Not a sent.

I remember, too, the appeals that were made all over the land to volunteer and enlist, and in response to what I assume was the Government's own direction our people in California and in many other States in the Union volunteered in very, very large numbers.

When the invitation was thus extended by the Nation and when the Government itself thus asked for voluntary enlistments, it would not be unjust, I am sure, in making up the next quota of the draft that those voluntary enlistments should be accorded to the States and the States be given credit for them.

Last night I had very pointedly presented again to me this situation. I read once Hornung's "Raffles," and I was very much interested and entertained, and when I saw last night advertised at the Strand Theater that somebody was going to present "Raffles" I wandered over there. In the course of that film entertainment there was an appeal thrown upon the screen, and that appeal was substantially in this language:

"Enlist in the Naval Reserve.

"Enlist and if you are within the draft age due credit will be given."

I do not state with exactness the appeal, but I state it substantially.

It was an appeal to our people to enlist even if within the draft age. For the men enlisted the credit presumably is to be given to the particular locality. Now, when the Government thus appeals, when it asks and begs States for these voluntary enlistments, when the particular locality responds, and responds overwhelmingly, it is not entirely just, it seems to me, to put the entire quota of the draft upon those who have thus responded to the Government exactly the same as that quota in the draft is charged to those who have not responded to the Government.

That you may understand the disparity in figures I read the percentages of class 1, which will be required in various States if credit be given unto the States that have had many voluntary enlistments. You Senators who are from different States, I think, will with very great profit and interest follow the tables which have been provided by the Provost Marshal General.

Mr. LODGE. These are the percentages that would exist if credits were given?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Exactly, sir. Here are the States, and here are the percentages which would be required if credit were given:

Louisiana——

Mr. POMERENE. From what does the Senator read?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I am reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 6287, which contains the official tables given to Chairman DENT, of the House, by Provost Marshal Gen. Crowder:

Percentages of class 1 to be levied on the States.

Louisiana	76
South Dakota	70
Mississippi	68
Arkansas	67
Alabama	65
Wyoming	65
Wisconsin	63
Florida	61
Georgia	61

Massachusetts	10
Maine	8
Connecticut	4
Utah	4
Washington	3
California	0

It has been suggested to me that I explain again what these figures mean. They mean this, that if, in the draft that is about to be levied, credit were given for enlistments that have been asked by the Government and enlistments by the various States in the Army of the United States in response to the Government's appeals, then these percentages would be taken of the class 1 men in the various States. The question simply is this, Ought States to be credited with the men who have gone to the war? That in the last analysis is simply the problem and the question that I present to you.

We insist in our State, where there has been a rush of enlistments in response to the invitation and the appeal and the request of the Federal Government, where we have done our full duty in that regard, that those enlistments should be credited to our State, and that we should not be required now to add a number which will make us wholly disproportionate in the number of men that we furnish in this war, as compared with States where there have been little or no voluntary enlistments.

Mr. VARDAMAN. May I ask the Senator if he has the facts at hand showing what percentage of soldiers in the States volunteered and what percentage were drafted?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I have not the particular percentages, but I will say to the Senator that the tables from which I read are very full tables, and are found on pages 6286 and 6287 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I have not attempted to read all those tables.

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. As throwing some light on the question he has discussed, I find from the official figures published in the New York Times of March 30, the date of the end of the volunteer-enlistment period, the quota of voluntary enlistments in the State of California was 4,774 and the enlistments of the State of California were 17,017.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In order that the Senate may not be confused as to the proposition which the Senator from California is discussing so ably, and with much of which I am disposed to agree, I desire to say that the resolution the Senator is discussing is not the one now before the Senate and is not the one involved in this report. The Senator is discussing the provisions of Senate joint resolution 123, which passed the House after passing the Senate, and which will become a law as soon as the President signs it.

This conference report, I desire to have the Senate understand, has nothing to do with the particular proposition the Senator from California is now discussing.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, as I stated in the beginning, I do not desire at all to suggest a delay of the conference report or opposition to it; and I would not suggest, indeed, an endeavor to overturn—although I think it ought to be overturned—the rule that has been announced and the decision of the President and the Secretary of War and Provost Marshal Gen. Crowder. Nevertheless, I wanted to make plain the injustice that was done in various States, including the State of California, and thus present the subject matter to the Senate, and I took this as an appropriate time and an appropriate method in which to present it in this fashion.

If the Government continues to make its calls as it has made in the past, "if it continues to make its appeals as it has made those appeals in the past," if States which are enthusiastic respond to the call and appeal as some of these States have done, and then there is no recognition of that enthusiasm and response but quite a contrary view taken by the department, it seems that it will penalize enthusiasm and militate more or less against voluntary enlistments in the future. There ought to be one course or the other. If you require, for instance, so many men from a particular locality, and those men are produced by that locality, that ought to be the end of it; either one mode or the other should control. If the draft alone is to control, this should be made plain. If the Government, however, begs for volunteers, appeals for enlistments, and adopts the volunteer system in conjunction with the draft, as it has done, then full credit should be given for the numbers received from both draft and voluntary enlistments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for just a minute? There is much of justice in the contention of the Senator, and yet this condition might prevail: California and the West generally volunteered most generously at the first call. Assuming that the California volunteers were between 18 and 21 and over 30 there would be the whole quota made up of men between 18 and 21 and men above 30. It might be that every man between 21 and 30 would be exempt from the draft under the rule the Senator contends for in the next call, while in other States they would have to go into the service. Your volunteering, it is true, was most patriotic, yet under the rule the Senator contends for, under the next draft, all of draft age between 21 and 30 might be entirely exempt.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I concede the argument that has just been suggested by the Senator from Oregon is extremely persuasive. At first, when it was suggested to me, I thought possibly it ought to be conclusive, but upon mature reflection I reached the opinion, first, that you take from the man power, after all, and when you have taken from the man power that which you ask in numbers it ought to be amply sufficient and credit given therefor; and, secondly, the answer is found in appeals such as that thrown upon the screen here, and which I have no doubt was but a replica of similar appeals all over the country, asking men within the draft age to enlist and to volunteer in the Naval Reserve. In the system that has been adopted you penalize enthusiastic States, and you are penalizing localities that have responded at once and furnished their men by both voluntary enlistment and the draft. You have penalized them by saying, "You volunteered in answer to our fervid appeal, but we are not going to consider you as a part of your State's contingent at all." I call the inequitable condition to the attention of the Senate and to the fact—settled now, I presume, by the President, the Secretary of War, and Gen. Crowder—that to those States which have most readily and enthusiastically responded to the country's call a great injustice is done.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I have felt very much in accord with what the Senator from California has stated. I have never been able to understand the cause for excluding credit, inasmuch as those credits were largely used as a basis for obtaining enlistment at the beginning.

In this connection I desire to insert in the RECORD, because it is pertinent and bears on the very point to which the Senator from California has referred, a statement showing the quota that was accorded to each of the States in the Regular Army and the number of enlistments. From this can be readily determined by deducting from the total enlistments and drafts from the States how many actually were drafted and how many enlisted. I ask that this may be incorporated in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The statement referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Times.]

WASHINGTON, March 30.

The year of intensive recruiting for the Regular Army by voluntary enlistment ended with the close of business at the recruiting offices to-day. Figures of to-day's enlistments will not be available until Monday, but the showing up to the close of business on Friday night brings the total enlisted strength of the Regular Army to more than 500,000.

The recruiting campaign was begun shortly before the United States entered the war. Recruiting was begun in earnest on April 1, five days before the declaration of war and one day prior to President Wilson's appearance before Congress to deliver the address which resulted in that declaration. The Regular Army then consisted of 121,797 enlisted men, and in order to bring it to full war strength it was necessary to obtain 183,898 additional soldiers for all branches of the service.

So successful have been the efforts of the recruiting officers that they have more than doubled the number of recruits which they started out to get. Including the figures of Friday's enlistments, the number of recruits obtained since April 1 was 398,105. This figure, added to the enlisted strength on April 1, gives a total of 519,902, but this must be reduced by about 18,000 due to deaths, expiration of enlistments, etc.

Since the United States entered the war the President has received authority to organize new units and to enlist men for them within his discretion. This authority has lifted the lid off the prior fixed limit, and recruiting officers are accepting recruits physically and otherwise fit without regard to any set total of strength.

When the recruiting campaign was begun on April 1 each State and the District of Columbia was allotted a certain quota of enlistments based on population and prior enlistments. Only eight States have failed to complete their quotas. Six of them are in the South. Vermont is the only Northern State to fail, lacking 74 to fill its allotment of 710 up to yesterday. Wisconsin is the only Western State that has not filled its quota. It was allotted 4,666, and is still shy 332.

The other States which have failed to fill the allotted quotas are Arkansas, allotted 3,148, lacks 738; Louisiana, allotted 3,312, lacks 73; Mississippi, allotted 3,634, lacks 1,933; North Carolina, allotted 4,412, lacks 1,469; South Carolina, allotted 3,030, lacks 1,345; and Virginia, allotted 4,122, lacks 1,288.

Some of the States have far exceeded their allotments. Pennsylvania, with an allotment of 15,330, has furnished 45,266. New York, with an allotment of 18,226, has furnished 43,438. Illinois has furnished 28,336 on a quota of 11,276. Texas is numerically the banner Southern State, with 11,931 recruits on an allotment of 7,792, unless Missouri is classed with the South and gets credit for its showing of 6,534 allotted and 15,214 obtained.

The result of the Regular Army recruiting in other States that went far beyond the number of recruits allotted is shown in the following table:

State.	Quota.	Enlistments.
California	4,754	17,015
Connecticut	2,228	4,946
District of Columbia	662	1,465
Florida	1,504	3,315
Georgia	5,218	7,672
Idaho	650	2,505
Indiana	5,400	18,254
Iowa	4,400	12,163
Massachusetts	6,732	19,127
Michigan	5,620	17,739
Minnesota	4,150	9,567
Montana	752	5,912
Nebraska	2,854	8,186
Nevada	162	1,537
New Jersey	5,074	10,023
Ohio	9,534	19,767
Oregon	1,344	6,569
Utah	746	4,180
Wyoming	290	1,316

On April 1 the total strength of all the Army was as follows: Regular Army—Officers, 5,791; enlisted men, 121,797. National Guard in Federal service—Officers, 3,733; enlisted men, 76,713. Regular Army Reserve—Officers, 2,573 (including members of Officers' Reserve Corps not of regular service); enlisted men, 4,000. Total officers, 12,097; enlisted men, 202,510; grand total, 214,607.

The approximate strength of the Army of the United States, as shown by figures prepared in the office of The Adjutant General, on March 26 was as follows:

	Officers.	Enlisted men.
Regular Army	11,003	501,218
National Guard	15,438	410,652
Reserve Corps	101,268	78,250
National Army	.....	515,964
Total	127,712	1,503,084

Officers of the National Army are included in those listed as Reserve Corps officers.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the extract which the Senator from Michigan presented was from a newspaper, but I have in my hand from the department the quotas of each State in the Regular Army, and the very last returns of enlistments up to April 30. I think it is a little more explanatory than the percentages which were given in the RECORD. I think if Senators will take the trouble to examine those returns, which I ask to have printed, first, the quota and then the volunteer enlistments in the Regular Army, they will understand the system perfectly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Massachusetts? The Chair hears none, and the request is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I gather from the discussion that there is an inequality in the contribution of man power among the States, and that under the resolution which has been adopted some States are required to contribute more than others. I sympathize entirely with the reflections of my colleague, and I should like to ask the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee to advise the Senate more specifically what is the justification of the recommendation of the Military Affairs Committee to the Senate to enact the law by which there is such a manifest inequality. I should like, Mr. President, the attention of the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was trying to give the Senator my attention but was interrupted by others.

Mr. PHELAN. I said that I sympathize with the reflections made by my colleague, and it seems to me a gross injustice that there should be required a greater contribution of man power proportionately from some States than from others. I should like to know why the Military Affairs Committee advised the Senate to pass such an enactment where such an injustice may be wrought. I did not understand the Senator when he addressed the Senate to answer, nor did it appear to me that he wholly answered the contention of my colleague [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I did not go into a full discussion of the subject that had been so ably presented by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], because, as I said a while ago, the bill that the Senator was discussing had already passed the Senate and the House of Representatives, and it only awaits the signature of the President to become a law. The conference report which is now before the Senate has not the question that is now being discussed involved in it at all.

The Senator from California asks me why the Military Affairs Committee suggested the enactment of such a law, which, as he claims, is so unjust. I will simply say, in reply to that, that the bill came to our committee from and with the approval of the War Department. I am now referring to the bill which has passed Congress and not to the one involved in the conference report. The position which the President took on the measure in the first instance, when it was before the House of Representatives, was the same as that which is now being insisted upon by the Senators from California. Later, and I think properly, the President receded from that position, and took the position which is embodied in the bill as it finally passed. If the Senator from California will look at the last Official Bulletin, he will find the last letter of the President on the bill in question.

Mr. President, I am not willing to concede the injustice of the proposition involved in the bill as to the quotas of the States. While I agree with the Senator from California that it does work a hardship in some instances, it is not because the principle is unjust. I think that the Senate will bear me out that I was one of the few men in the Senate who always opposed anything like a volunteer law, simply because the duties of citizenship devolve upon every man a duty to his country. My position always has been, Mr. President, that because a man is protected in life, in limb, and in property, a reciprocal obligation demands that whenever the country's call comes he must render service to it. If the insistance which some of us made here when the draft law was under discussion had been adopted, and if, instead of having any volunteer system whatsoever, we had made it incumbent upon everybody within certain ages and in certain classes to serve, we would not have this question of injustice, or apparent injustice, now.

The result now is, under the operation of a volunteer system and the draft law, that we have young men between 18 and 21 years of age, and men with families whose patriotic hearts were reached by the appeal for service to their country between 31 and 45 years of age, who have gone into the National Guard and later been drafted into the Regular Army and who are now fighting the battles of their country, when I claim that those men ought not to have and would not have been called upon under the draft law. Men from 31 years and upward with families ought not to have been permitted to enlist, but all between certain ages ought to have been placed upon exactly the same plane of equality and all ought to have been compelled, on the basis of population or some other proper and uniform basis, to have been called upon to serve their country.

Now, we will take California—than which there is no more patriotic State in the Union, unless it be Oregon; and I believe California did beat us with reference to its volunteering—and under the rule the Senator now invokes there would be no more men called from California. In that State men went into the Army even under 18 years of age, with the consent of their parents, and I doubt not if the records were examined it would be found that the same thing occurred in the case of the young men of Oregon and of Nevada, both of which States stood near the top of the list for volunteers.

Mr. President, I say that if there was any injustice at all, the injustice existed in allowing men of the ages mentioned to volunteer. As some of us inquired at the time the draft law was enacted, why not wait until the draft law takes effect and then call upon all equally to render military service to the country instead of permitting volunteers?

Under any volunteer system there are bound to be injustices, Mr. President. What would be the result of the rule which the Senator insists upon if it were to be adopted? Many men between 21 and 30 in California and other States where volunteering has been most generous will entirely escape the service. In other words, these men who, but for the patriotism of the volunteers would be compelled to serve, would under the rule insisted upon escape service entirely at the second draft in many or in some of the States of the Union.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That can not be so, if with the authority of the Government such appeals are made as I last night saw at the Strand Theater. You can see there thrown upon the screen appeals to men within the draft age to enlist. If that sort of appeal—I am very careful, if you observe, conditionally to state it—if that sort of appeal is made with governmental authority, the Senator is in error in what he says.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator from Oregon permit me to ask a question of the Senator from California?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is the Senator from California sure that the appeal was directed at men of the draft age?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I am positive of that. I talked with the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who is now upon his feet, very briefly concerning this matter upon one occasion, but the matter had passed with me until last night, when in front of me I saw flashed on the screen an appeal for men of draft age.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator from California say that this appeal was flashed upon the screen under the auspices of the Committee on Public Information?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I will not say; I do not know. I assume, however, that it was done under governmental authority.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me observe, Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], that the War Department has long since issued the most specific rule forbidding the voluntary enlistment of men within the draft age. I assume the recollection of the Senator from California is correct. I have every reason to believe it is. It is another instance of the Committee on Information giving misinformation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understood the Senator from California to refer to men to be enlisted in the Navy?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. It was the Naval Reserve; that is true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I was speaking of the Army; I thought the Senator from California meant the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I mentioned in my remarks specifically the Naval Reserves, enlistment in which was appealed for; and the Senator will find in my remarks that that was what I first spoke of.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, I was mistaken. I thought the Senator was speaking of the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. But what is the difference, whether it is for the Naval Reserves or for the Army, if they are asking for men to enter in the Naval Reserves who are within the draft age?

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon, when interrupted, was about to enter into a very interesting discussion of a point which is in my mind. Does he say that when we use the words "man power" there is a differentiation between the men of draft age and the men under and over draft age—that is, volunteers?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think not.

Mr. PHELAN. It is all man power?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is all man power. But to illustrate what I mean let me give a very simple illustration: We will say that California had to furnish 50 men in the first instance and that 50 men between 18 and 21 volunteered. Now, she has furnished her quota outside of the draft age. We will say that Alabama had to furnish 50 men, and that she furnished only 25 men of all ages. Then comes the second call. Now, when it comes to that call, California we will say, is exempted under the rule that the Senator would invoke, because she has furnished her quota, all, however, between 18 and 21; and, therefore, Mr. President, the men between 21 and 31 in California escape the second call, because the State has already furnished her quota outside of the draft age entirely. Why should her men between 21 and 30 escape the service? They have simply been furnished substitutes by operation of law. Alabama will have to furnish 25 men within the draft age, which is proper, while the men of California within that age escape entirely. As a question between the States that may be just, but as between the individual citizens of the Nation it is unjust.

Mr. PHELAN and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield and, if so, to whom?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield, first, to the Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. There seems to be a disparagement in the mind of the Senator in regard to men who enlist between 18 and 21. Is it not a matter of fact that the battles of the Civil War were won by men between 18 and 21?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Oh, Mr. President, if the Senator had been here while the draft law was being discussed he would have known that the Senator from Oregon insisted morning, noon, and night upon fixing the age of service in this country between 18 and 25. I stated then, and I state now, that the Civil War was fought by young men from 14 to 18. I have no disparaging word to say about the young men; they are the best soldiers in the world, and I only regret now that the ages for service are not the ages between 18 and 25, instead of between 21 and 31, for the simple reason that whenever you get above 21 you begin to reach the men with families, the men who have conditions at home requiring their presence, and the younger the age is, leaving out the question of sentiment, if you please, the less likely you are to disturb industrial, commercial, and social life.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. It seems to me perfectly clear that it must be the policy of the Government to distribute equitably calls for man power. Under the present law, as I understand, we draft some men and we accept volunteers. Why should the Government continue that system when it is their desire equitably to distribute the call for men? Why should we continue a system which will permit of the taking of two men from one locality when it only takes one man from another? It seems to me that, so long as the Government permits that condition to continue, a gross injustice will be committed against certain communities. I do not see how it can be explained; I have seen no explanation that satisfies me.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is hard to work out a system that will not work injustice in individual cases or injustice in a great many cases, and when the Senator can evolve a system that will avoid the very difficulty of which he now complains, he will have performed a work which will entitle him to a monument at the hands of his countrymen.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator a question with regard to the figures that he gave when interrupted by the Senator from California. He took California and Alabama, and to illustrate the point said that under the contention made, if California had furnished a sufficient number of men under the volunteer system, it would not be required to furnish any men under the next draft call, whereas if Alabama had not done that Alabama would have to furnish a quota under the draft. Is there any injustice about that? I should like to ask the Senator if that is not, after all, fair?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is fair to the State, but is it fair as to the individual? Suppose all the men in California who had enlisted were young men, for instance, is it fair that all the men who are above the age of 21 and between 21 and 31 in California should escape in the next draft?

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is answered by the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. The law provides—it has not been done illegally; it has been done under the law—that men may enlist anywhere between the ages of 18 and 45; they can be drafted only between the ages of 21 and 31. Now, so long as the law is complied with, and California, we will say to illustrate, has furnished a thousand men under the volunteer system, when a thousand men are called for, and Alabama has not furnished any, under the volunteer system, and then you draft a thousand men out of Alabama and none out of California, is not that equitable? Is not that absolutely fair, and is it not legal? Would it be right in that case to say to California, "You have already supplied a thousand men, although they may be young men"—and the Senator says that they make better soldiers or just as good soldiers at least as the older men—would it be right to say to California, "A thousand of your men have enlisted, yet we will give you no credit for those thousand men. We are going to take under the draft just as many from California as though none had volunteered"?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, there is merit in the contention of the Senators, and there is very much to be said on both sides of the proposition; there is no question about that; but I do not know how it is going to be remedied without amending the law that has already passed Congress. It can not be done on the pending motion to confirm the conference report upon a measure which does not involve the question at issue.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator will permit me, as I understand the Senator from Oregon, he is basing his argument in favor of this system on the fact that it is not just to take a man between 21 and 31 from one State and not take a man of the same age from another State. If the Senator would stop there, I would agree with his logic and agree with what seems to be his feeling of justice and equity; but, if we are going to do equity, would not equity suggest that we surrender the man between 18 and 21 back to the State and not compel that State to furnish at the same time a man between 21 and 31 and also a man between 18 and 21?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I might say to the Senator now that if he will undertake to formulate a law that will place all the man power of this country on exactly the same footing as to age, I will assist him as best I can to enact such a law, even if it goes to the extent of releasing to the States the young men between 18 and 21, because for the life of me I can not see why we should call upon young men of this age to serve their country under the volunteer system which we had in vogue before the war and make others serve under a conscript system. All should be treated exactly alike.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I, of course, could not perhaps suggest a measure that would work absolute justice under all the circumstances, but I will undertake to devise a system that will be more just than the one we now have.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, it is very much easier to talk about formulating a just system than actually to crystalize one into a statute. The laws that we have, have been worked out after very great pains and great effort upon the part of the War Department, and I think it has been attempted to do exact justice.

The law we have as to age limits is a compromise, as Senators know. The House insisted upon applying the draft between the ages of 21 and 45, and the Senate insisted upon 18 and 25. What we have was a compromise; neither body got what it wanted.

All I have to say, in conclusion, is that, while there is merit in the viewpoint of the Senators from California, in so far as this conference report is concerned, it is entirely aside from the record. The report which is now asked to be confirmed does not bear upon that proposition at all.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, does the Senator say that the bill which provides for this inequality is now in the hands of the President?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes, sir; but I do not admit its injustice or inequality.

Mr. PHELAN. Then it would be in order to appeal to the President to withhold his signature?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely.

Mr. PHELAN. I shall petition him to that effect.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is all right; but I want to say to the Senator, as I said a while ago, that the view of the President now is different from the view entertained by him when the bill fixing the quotas of the several States first passed the Senate; and if the Senator will remember, the House amended the Senate bill to conform to the wishes of the President, and later receded from that very proposition, basing its recession, as I understand it, upon his second letter of advice.

Mr. PHELAN. I have in my hand here the letter of the President, who is generally a very positive man, and who expresses his convictions in very forcible language, and generally justifies himself, at any rate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I ask the Senator what is the date of that letter?

Mr. PHELAN. This is dated May 7th and is addressed to Mr. DENT; and this letter contains no information whatever. He simply says that he has changed his mind because somebody better informed had so advised him—the Secretary of War, I presume, or the Judge Advocate General. I have been in communication with competent authorities, who regard the creation by Gen. Crowder of the draft legislation as of the highest quality and monumental, and yet they disagree with him on this particular matter.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator just a moment? I ask him if he will kindly read the first letter of the President, which was read into the RECORD in the House, in connection with the last one which he has just referred to, where the President, as I recall now, in general terms agreed with the viewpoint of the Senator from California, but later changed his mind, and acting upon his second letter, the House receded from the position which the Senator from California advocates.

Mr. PHELAN. But I do not see why the President should have changed his mind, and I think it is quite fair to him to petition that he reconsider his letter of May 7.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the Senator has said that the President is a very firm and a very positive man. To that I agree. But I can not answer why he changed his mind. That was a matter of his own conscience. I am not the President's conscience keeper. I suggest to the Senator that he himself ask the President why this last letter and why the first, and if the Senator thinks he can get him to change his mind and write a third letter that is for him to decide upon.

Mr. PHELAN. As Emerson says, "Consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds," and his is not a little mind. I feel quite confident that he will receive such a petition respectfully and give it at least careful consideration.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no doubt of that. And I have no doubt but that he will do what he thinks is just and proper.

Subsequently, Mr. PHELAN asked to insert his petition to the President, which is as follows:

MAY 13, 1918.

To the PRESIDENT,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There was a discussion to-day in the Senate on the subject of the bill now in your hands providing for further draft of troops without allowing credit to the several States for volunteers. I am aware that you have expressed yourself upon this subject; first, in your letter addressed to Mr. DENT under date of March 26, where you thought it would be perfectly proper to include such allowances in the new draft law; and again on May 7, when, addressing the same gentleman, you took, doubtless for reasons satisfactory to you, a contrary view. The States of California, Nevada, and Rhode Island, on account of the large number of volunteers, if credits were allowed therefor, would not be called upon at once for more men under the first draft if your first view prevailed; but under the bill now before you for action these States will be called upon to fill up their quotas under the draft as though they had not made their contribution in volunteers. This seems to establish an inequality between the States. While the three States referred to are doubtless willing to make a larger contribution of man power, if necessary, there does not appear to be any necessity. As a result California will be deprived of the services of her men out of proportion to other States necessary for industrial and agricultural employment in what may be called war industries. She is penalized industrially, in other words, because of her excess of patriotism, in so far as the boys rushed to the colors before required by the draft. In the case of California there was a total in class 1 between the ages of 21 and 31 of 58,666 men. The first call brought to the Army 23,060 men and the total number of volunteers to all branches of the service was 68,205. These volunteers ranged in age from 18 to 40. As I understand it, if the war lasts for several years the volunteers under 21 years of age would be required to become eligible for draft, but the men in excess of 31 years of age would still be the extra contribution of California. The discussion in the Senate convinced me, so far as it went, that there are two good reasons why credit should be allowed to States for volunteers: First, in order that there might be a perfect equality as between the States in their contribution of man power; and, secondly, that the States having patriotically contributed volunteers should be allowed to use the men who would now be called to the camps under the proposed law for necessary industrial and agricultural purposes. In other words, the States which have made few contributions in volunteers have an unequal industrial advantage. I take from the official records, page 6286 and page 6287 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the following statistical data, which by comparison shows the inequality of which I complain. The following States are of about equal size:

State.	Total number in class 1 between 21 and 31.	First Army draft.	Total credits for all branches of service.
California	58,666	23,060	68,205
Alabama	52,815	13,612	26,938
Louisiana	56,781	13,582	23,685
North Carolina	55,682	15,974	30,837
Iowa	56,938	12,749	38,124
Indiana	60,937	17,510	48,083
Minnesota	65,084	17,778	48,852

Perhaps the matter has gone too far, and that Congress should have itself to blame for not proceeding with more caution, but if you regard it of sufficient importance, and the bill is returned without your approval, Congress will have an opportunity to consider a modification of the act.

The reason why the draft law is accepted generally by the country is that it stood, before this recent bill, on a basis of perfect equality as between the States as well as among the people.

I am, respectfully, yours,

JAMES D. PHELAN.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think there is a fundamental mistake in the law. We are trying to run two different systems side by side. We are drafting a number of the men, and we are allowing others to volunteer, and constantly swelling the ranks of the Regular Army and making it larger by the volunteers. That inevitably produces the situation that a large majority of the States have not only furnished their quotas to the Regular Army but they have furnished twice and three times and sometimes four and five times their quotas to the Regular Army. They are not all boys between 18 and 20, either. They have furnished them, and, of course, if you give credits the States that have furnished the most men will get the largest credits, and the States that have furnished the fewest men will get the smallest credits, and will be required to bring forward more drafted men—men who would not volunteer. Now, that is the plain English of it.

The reason the Senator from Oregon gives for the bill is that the States should not be allowed to fill the place of a slacker with a young fellow between 18 and 20. I do not think that is the only reason. I see the force of that difficulty, and I have put into the RECORD just the quotas demanded and against them the men furnished in the several States. I commend those dry figures to the consideration of the Senate, and I think after they have read them they will see several reasons why we landed on "no credits." But, Mr. President, those of us who come from States which have furnished many times their quotas, as well as the full draft, of course, have the consolation of knowing that if they do not get credit here they get credit elsewhere.

I ask that the little paragraph which I send to the desk be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW ENGLAND HAS 1,103 CASUALTIES.

BOSTON, May 9.

The names of 1,108 New England men have appeared on casualty lists since American forces landed in France a tabulation of reports from the front showed to-day. There were 293 deaths, 789 wounded, 20 missing, and 6 reported as prisoners; 153 were killed in action, 35 died of wounds, 86 of disease, and 19 of other causes.

Of the total, 738 New England casualties were reported since April 15, or during the time American troops were taking an active part in operations against the enemy. A large proportion of the casualties were from distinctively New England units.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, our Army to-day is made up of volunteers and conscripts. The more volunteers the fewer conscripts that will be required. Both of these classes of soldiers are provided for and approved by the Government. The draft law as originally passed was understood by Congress to provide for an equitable apportionment among the various States. It was to be apportioned according to population; but, owing to a decision of the Provost Marshal or the Judge Advocate General, the population was not fixed upon the basis of the number of people who lived in the States but according to some other plan which I never have been quite able to understand. I know, however, that it took from Michigan several thousand more soldiers than would have been required from that State if population had been the basis of apportionment.

Michigan is not complaining. Her young men have responded willingly, eagerly, to their country's call. When volunteers were asked for Michigan's quota was something in excess of 5,000, but over 17,800 young men volunteered, a majority of whom were within the draft age. As I understand, it is proposed now that, notwithstanding there has been a large number of volunteers, far beyond the quota apportioned by the Government, yet those sections of the country whose sons were patriotic enough to enlist are not to be given any credit for such enlistments. I insist, Mr. President, that the original notion should be carried out and that those States which did not volunteer ought not to have their sons protected now because of the excessive number of volunteers in other sections of the country. Certain it is that a State should be credited with its volunteers within the conscription age.

The Senator from Oregon calls "slackers" the men in the draft age in California and Michigan and Pennsylvania and New York and Massachusetts and other States who neither enlisted nor were drafted in the first call, and others charge that the advocates of proper credits are speaking at the request of these men. Senators are mistaken. I insist, however, that men of the draft age shall be treated alike in all States and that the patriots of one State shall not be substituted for the "slackers" of another State. Under this new plan the thousands of volunteers from California and Michigan and other States will lessen the number of conscripts from other States which have already benefited by an unjust and unjustifiable apportionment.

There is a glorious disposition in many parts of the country of men to enter the Army in this time of necessity, but I submit that the Federal Government ought not to propose or permit discrimination which encourages slacking in some sections of the United States and fails to reward those other sections whose people spring forward at the call of duty and enlist to preserve our common country in its present supreme hour of peril.

I do not understand the philosophy of Senators. There may be some force in the argument, and I have great respect for the opinion of the Senator from Oregon, than whom no more patriotic, no more earnest, no harder-working Senator exists; but I think the President was right before he changed his mind the last time. I would have liked to have seen, and I would like to see now—if this is not the measure, and another one is still to come on, following it—justice done to every State of the Union. I ask for nothing else. I shall be satisfied with nothing less.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, what is this justice that the Senator wants to have done? It is justice to a lot of men who are subject to the draft, and it is to relieve them. God bless the boys who had patriotism enough to volunteer all over the country, no matter where they came from! Why should these stay-at-homes who are subject to the draft bank upon the patriotism of these men, and say: "For God's sake, relieve us from the burden, because we have had some patriotic boys who enlisted?" I can not see the philosophy of it.

One beauty of the present law, as distinguished from the draft law we had in the days of the Civil War, was that in those days men could hire substitutes; and we who remember those days remember what a speculation there was in substitutes, how they were paid five hundred and a thousand dollars and even fifteen hundred dollars. Rich men got immunity. Now, this is not a speculation of money, but it is speculation upon the patriotism of the men who volunteered and have gone into the Army. These men who stay at home, who are subject to the draft, say: "In order to diminish the pressure and demand upon us, we should have credit for these men who have been patriotic enough to volunteer."

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. NELSON. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I ask for information. Is there anything to indicate whether the volunteers are within the draft age, or above or below the draft age, or what proportion of the volunteers are amenable to the draft?

Mr. NELSON. Most of those who have enlisted since the registration took place are outside of the draft age.

Mr. KING. If they were within the draft age, then, of course, the argument that has been made, as I understand, by the Senator from Oregon, would not be applicable.

Mr. NELSON. I have been much discouraged at the sentiment that has been manifested in some quarters. I get imploring letters from men who say they are 32, 33, or 34 years of age, and they say: "Why, Mr. Nelson, here I have been trying for three months or for six months to get into the Army and I can not." What are those men trying for? Why, for a commission—nothing else. Sometimes I write to some of these men, and say to them: "You can get into the Army the way I got in. Go and volunteer as an enlisted man"; and once in a while I tell these men who come begging for a commission that I will recommend them for privates.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. NELSON. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator get any letters now and then from highly patriotic individuals who tell him that, while they are above the draft age, and therefore can not serve their country in war, they would like to serve it in some department in Washington?

Mr. NELSON. Yes; oh, yes. I get any amount of letters of that kind. I have known college men who are so anxious to avoid the fighting line that they will enlist in the Quartermaster Corps and camp out here, with a view of going over to Europe to do God knows what—chop timber, run sawmills, or something else—any way to get out of the fighting line. It is very curious. You get these letters, and they say: "Oh, I am so patriotic! I am anxious to do my bit in this war. I have been pining and yearning for it. I am so anxious to do my bit, and I want you to help me." And when you get to the end of the long letter, they want a commission somewhere.

Mr. WILLIAMS. By the way, generally their letters are preceded by a very high compliment to the Senator, are they not?

Mr. NELSON. Oh, yes; to be sure.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Telling the Senator how they consider that he has always been a leader in the best thought of the day, and so forth.

Mr. NELSON. That goes without saying; but, fortunately, I am in a position that some of you are not. I tell them boldly what I did when I was 18 years of age, and I say to them, "Go, thou, and do likewise."

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no other resemblance between the Senator and his correspondents.

Mr. NELSON. So, Mr. President, while looking at this question from a narrow standpoint, you may say that the States should have credit for the volunteers; looking at it from a broad, patriotic standpoint, I insist that these men who are subject to the draft and are within the draft age have no business to ask for this credit. They have no business to bank on the patriotism of the men who have seen fit to enlist voluntarily in the Army and the Navy of the United States. For that reason I heartily agree with the Senator from Oregon.

As I said a moment ago, the beauty of this draft law, compared with the old one, is that under the old law they could get substitutes—buy substitutes. Now you want these men to get substitutes in another way—not for money, but by banking on the patriotism of their fellow citizens who have had the gumption and the courage to enlist.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will take just two minutes to call attention to the conference report.

When the bill was before the Senate I submitted an amendment excluding medical students from the operation of the law. It seems that the other House did not agree to that in the first place, but finally consented to a modification of it, and there is an exclusion now so far as students are concerned who have already matriculated. I want to call attention to the fact that while that gives some relief it does not go far enough, and in the near future we shall have to legislate so as to give a further exemption.

The medical profession is being drawn on to a very great extent, and to such an extent that at the present time our hospitals are unable, in some instances, to get internes; and they have made the suggestion that medical students in their last year may be admitted as internes, which is an unusual thing. If we should send as many more soldiers to the field as we have already in service, it will be very necessary, indeed, that we educate a much larger number of young men to the medical profession than we have been doing in the past.

However, the provision in the conference report that those who have already matriculated shall be exempted will be of some assistance. I congratulate the Senate conferees on securing that concession from the other body, and, of course, I shall be content to vote for the conference report as it stands.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask the Senator from Alabama to allow the unfinished business to be temporarily laid aside in order to complete the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask the Senator how long he thinks it will take.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I believe a vote can be reached in a few minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Mississippi has the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if I were to express a desire to conserve from my income tax or from any other tax because somebody in my community had donated a million dollars to the United States Government, I do not think anyone would feel very much sympathy with me. When I find a man wants to be relieved from his duty under the selective-draft law to defend his country with his body upon the ground that somebody outside of the draft law has necessarily offered his body I do not think there is any need for any great sympathy, either, from the right-thinking sort of a man.

I do not see any patriotism, I do not see any common sense, in the idea that I, living in a certain community, should be relieved from a common burden of citizenship upon the ground that the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. GALLINGER, or the Senator from Minnesota, KNUTE NELSON, had done unnecessary service. The supererogation of work whereby men can gain salvation, according to a certain religious faith, would be carried a little bit too far if we carried that into operation. I might count my patriotism, then, by the fact that either one of those two other men had exceeded his duty of patriotism. I can not understand for the life of me why any man should be relieved from his duty by urging the fact that somebody else has done more than his duty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

PARITY OF THE AMERICAN DOLLAR ABROAD.

Mr. OWEN. Will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for just a moment? I want to ask action upon Senate resolution 238, asking for certain information.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask the Senator how long he thinks it will take?

Mr. OWEN. If there is any objection to it at all, I will withdraw it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will yield, if there is unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate resolution 238.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

Mr. KENYON. Let us understand what it is.

Mr. OWEN. The resolution is one of inquiry in regard to certain national exchange matters. I think no one will have any objection whatever to anything in it. If there is, I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to advise the Senate of the amount severally of commercial and financial bills payable in terms of the currency of the neutral nations of Europe which have been bought and sold severally by the member banks of the Federal Reserve System and other banks and banking houses dealing in foreign exchange in the city of New York from January 1 to April 1, 1918, and the amount of profit in such transactions, and to advise the Senate what steps have been taken to protect the par value of the American dollar in the neutral countries of Europe, and what is the amount of foreign balances held in the United States at this time by such neutral nations.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, further insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 38 and 90, asks a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Mr. EVANS, and Mr. FIELDS managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10264) to prevent in time of war departure from or entry into the United States contrary to the public safety.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. J. Res. 123) providing for the calling into military service of certain classes of persons registered and liable for military service under the terms of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," and it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives agreeing to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, further insisting upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 38 and 90, and requesting a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate agree to the further conference asked for by the House and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. MARTIN, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. SMOOT conferees at the further conference on the part of the Senate.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I believe when the pending bill was temporarily laid aside we were considering section 7. We are ready to proceed now with that section.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, section 7 of the bill which is under consideration by the Senate provides:

That to promote the conservation of food products and to facilitate the collection and delivery thereof from producer to consumer, and the delivery of articles necessary in the production of such food products to the producers, the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to conduct experiments in the operation of motor-vehicle truck routes in the vicinity of such cities of the United States as he may select, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and the cost of such experiments, not exceeding $100,000, may be paid by the Postmaster General out of any unexpended appropriations of the Postal Service, and the Postmaster General shall report the result of such experiments to the Congress at the earliest practicable date.

Let me say in explanation of this section that more than a year ago, after extended and thorough discussion of this subject, the United States Senate adopted substantially if not identically this proposition in the form it now appears. It went to the House and was there favorably reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, but the bill was not acted upon in the pressure of business there. However, the House of Representatives has recently passed this same proposition by a unanimous vote, I think, except that instead of appropriating $100,000 as we suggest here they appropriated $300,000, and provided a revolving fund.

Mr. President, the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, within the operation of whose bureau this service comes, has already conducted considerable experiments under the authority of the star-route legislation, enough to convince that official of the Government that that is a very good service and has very great possibilities. I am going to ask the Secretary of the Senate to read his report on this subject to the Senate. Then I shall have a few words more to say and will be ready for the Senate to vote on the proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TRAMMELL in the chair). Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, May 8, 1918.

Hon. THOMAS W. HARDWICK,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR HARDWICK: The parcel-post motor-truck service between large postal centers, and to and from producing territory in the vicinity thereof, has been so successful within the limited zone where the attempt to establish such service has been made as to be worthy of particular attention and definite legislative action.

As you are aware, six routes are in operation, as follows: Between Philadelphia and Baltimore, Annapolis and Washington; Baltimore and Solomons Island, Md.; Baltimore and Lancaster, Pa.; Washington and Leonardtown, Md.; Philadelphia and Atlantic City, N. J.; and Washington and Frederick, via Mount Airy, Md.

Thus a connecting route operates between the three large market centers of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and feeder routes radiate out of Philadelphia, out of Baltimore, and out of Washington.

On the trunk line, or connecting route, between Washington and Philadelphia the mail transported is so heavy that it was necessary to increase the number of cars out of Philadelphia to West Grove, Pa., and return, and in the immediate future an additional car will have to be utilized.

On this route the total annual receipts at the post office at Kennett Square, Pa., a third-class office, did not exceed $15,791.03 for 1917, whereas the present income of this office indicates earnings will be considerably over $22,000 per annum, or a gain of approximately 50 per cent, entirely due to the introduction of motor-truck service between this small village and the market in Philadelphia.

The earnings on the Baltimore-Solomons Island route average nearly $350 a day, at an expense of not more than $25 a day, thus indicating earnings of more than $110,000 a year, or an expense of not to exceed $7,500 a year, including all direct and indirect expenses incident to the operation of the route. A detailed cost sheet is attached hereto and marked Exhibit A.

It is conceded that a portion of the earnings of this route must be distributed to the incoming and outgoing operations to or beyond the terminus at Baltimore, and to that end 66⅔ per cent of the postage revenue could be applied, and there remain net earnings of approximately $35,000 a year, against which the total operating expense would not exceed $7,500. I have deliberately increased the indirect, or overhead, operating expenses, in order that no possible question could be raised as to the profitable possibilities involved.

There is no rail or water service anyhere in the vicinity of the territory served by this route, consequently it is not only noncompetitive but is a feeder to such railway or boat service as may be established from Baltimore to points where the mailable matter that appears on the route may be destined.

I emphatically assert that there are numerous localities within the United States where identical conditions prevail and where the establishment of transportation facilities from the producers domiciled thereon to the nearest large market center would result in earnings and expenditures in the same proportion as prevail between Baltimore and Solomons Island, Md.

From Fredericksburg, Va., into southeastern Virginia, between the York and James Rivers, is a type of territory of this variety. From Gettysburg to Bedford, Pa., along the Lincoln Highway, no transportation facilities of any kind exist, and this large farming territory could be connected direct with the markets in Pittsburgh and Philadelphia and Baltimore, and eventually produce results similar to those on the Baltimore and Solomons Island route.

Senators and Representatives in Congress are in a position to indicate where at the present time there exist no adequate direct means of contact between producers and consumers or vice versa.

Connecting routes can be established between Portland, Me., and Nashua, N. H.; thence from Nashua to Worcester, Mass.; from Worcester to Hartford, Conn.; from Hartford to New York City; from New York City to Philadelphia; from Philadelphia to Baltimore; from Baltimore to Washington; from Washington to Richmond, Va.; from Richmond to Lynchburg, Va.; from Lynchburg to Raleigh, N. C.; from Raleigh to Columbia, S. C.; from Columbia to Augusta, Ga.; from Augusta to Macon; from Macon to Columbus, Ga.; from Columbus to Montgomery, Ala.; from Montgomery to Jackson, Miss.; from Jackson to Baton Rouge, La.; from Baton Rouge to New Orleans.

Likewise from Baton Rouge to New Grenada, Miss.; from New Grenada to Memphis, Tenn.; from Memphis to Nashville; from Nashville to Louisville, Ky.; from Louisville to Indianapolis, Ind.; from Indianapolis to Chicago, Ill.

In another direction: Between Indianapolis, Ind., and Columbus, Ohio; from Columbus to Zanesville, Ohio; from Zanesville to Wheeling, W. Va.; from Wheeling to Pittsburgh, Pa.; from Pittsburgh to Bedford, Pa.; from Bedford to Gettysburg, Pa.; from Gettysburg to Philadelphia; also from Gettysburg to Baltimore, Md., where the western line would connect with the eastern line, heretofore outlined.

It is also possible to operate from Columbus, Ohio, to Cincinnati, Ohio; from Cincinnati to Louisville, Ky.; from Louisville to Lexington, Tenn.; from Lexington to Chattanooga; from Chattanooga to Atlanta, Ga.; from Atlanta to Columbus, Ga., where, again, a connection is made with the eastern line, operating between Portland, Me., and New Orleans, La.

Naturally it is possible to operate many other connecting links, and from each of the market centers at the end of the connecting links herein mentioned feeder routes, operating into producing territory within 100 miles, could easily be established and would unquestionably transport mailable matter the postage on which would not be less than $20,000 annually per route.

To provide for the service outlined in the connecting links heretofore mentioned would require approximately 300 motor cars, the purchase price of which would be in the neighborhood of $750,000 to $1,000,000 and on which the operating cost would not exceed $3,000 per annum per car, or approximately $900,000 a year. At the minimum earnings stated above the 300 motor cars would earn $6,000,000 a year, and if they earned as much as the cars now operating between Baltimore and Solomons Island they would produce a revenue of about $33,000,000 a year.

It is not expected, however, that every motor route established would be as profitable as this one, but when mentioning the minimum figures it is worth while also to set forth what is the possible maximum income.

It is agreed when such earnings are apparent that the rates should be reduced. In doing this, however, the rates should not only include the cost of operation as a postal proposition but a certain amount of the net revenues from every route should be set aside for the improvement of the highway over which trucks travel. The net earnings on the Baltimore-Solomons Island route would easily maintain the highway in a splendid condition, and a similar possibility is self-evident in the territory along the coast and east of the Mississippi River, as outlined in the program herein set forth. Every foot of the highway over which this service may be established could, no doubt, be kept in splendid condition from the revenues derived from the operation of the parcel-post motor-truck routes thereon.

Under any and every condition the roads traveled between the termini herein mentioned should be selected exactly, as the routes now established between Philadelphia and Washington. The cars on this route leave Philadelphia by way of Oxford and the Conowingo crossing of the Susquehanna River, and are consequently from 20 to 25 miles distant from the railroad that travels directly between Philadelphia and Baltimore. From Baltimore to Washington the cars travel via Annapolis and Upper Marlboro, Md., and are, therefore, from 20 to 25 miles distant from the direct rail line between Baltimore and Washington. In similar manner the lines elsewhere should travel through territory not immediately adjacent to rail facilities, and thus the producers domiciled in such territory would be in direct contact with the parcel-post route, and it would be unnecessary for such producers or consumers, located on roads covered by parcel-post motor trucks, to transport their produce many miles to market or to available lines of transportation to market.

I invite particular attention to the numerous handlings necessary to convey produce under any system now in vogue from producer to consumer. While apparently there is little expense involved in such handlings, nevertheless, whether it is 10 per cent or one one-hundredth per cent of the cost of the produce, when multiplied by the millions of different operations necessary in the treatment of produce between the domicile of the producer and the table of the consumer it mounts into staggering sums, and the elimination of any of these operations will eventually affect the cost of delivery from producer to consumer to such an extent as will materially influence the cost of living.

A parcel-post motor truck made an experimental trip from Lancaster, Pa., to New York City, a distance of 182 miles, in 12 hours. The truck was loaded with 30 crates of eggs of 30 dozen each, or 10,800 eggs, 500 pounds of butter, 500 pounds of fresh sausage, 200 pounds of honey, and 4,000 one-day-old chicks. It arrived in New York City with but nine eggs broken and 2 chicks suffocated. But two handlings were involved—one at the domicile of the producer and the other at the warehouse of the addressee—as over against not less than 8 to 12 handlings under any other system of transportation now in existence.

It is not presumed that such a method can be derived in every case, this being the best possible collection and delivery service that could be performed by truck.

I trust that some definite legislative authority for the establishment of the particular service herein outlined may be assured and the purchase and operation of approximately 300 motor cars be provided for in order that a complete demonstration of the meritorious possibilities of this service may be presented to the Congress for further consideration at the earliest possible date.

It is vital to the welfare of the Nation that some direct means of communication between producers and consumers, and vice versa, be established. The patron in the city of Washington to-day pays 43 cents a dozen for eggs that are selling in the open market at York, Pa., not 100 miles from this city, at less than 36 cents a dozen. A motor-truck parcel-post service in operation between the cities will be taken advantage of by consumers when such possible economy is known to them.

Believe me to be,
Sincerely, yours,

JAS. I. BLAKSLEE,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. HARDWICK. I ask that the statement accompanying the letter be printed in the RECORD without being read. I do not care to burden the Senate with details.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

NOTE.—Considerably higher than the average quoted.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word in support of this proposition, and then I am prepared to take the sense of the Senate upon it.

It seems to me, in times like these, when an already mounting cost of living is lifted still higher by war conditions, we ought to experiment in every practical way to bring the producer in close and direct touch with the consumer, and it seems to me like anything that will accomplish that result ought to be carefully considered and ought to be tried out.

It does appear to me that if the country produce around these great cities could be carried into those cities by the simplest and shortest and most direct process, dispensing with as many middle men and with as many different kinds of processes as are possible, we will have accomplished a great deal toward the relief of the people in the great cities from the high cost of fruit and vegetables and all sorts of country produce, and at the same time we will have accomplished a great deal for the country people in giving them a direct and reasonably cheap method of communicating with the town customers in getting their produce, which might otherwise go to waste and much of which does otherwise go to waste, to a city market that is absolutely in need of it.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], in opposing this matter the other day, voiced some objections that were not without their weight with me. He objected, and objected very strenuously, to putting the Government into so many kinds of business. So do I; and yet we are confronted here by a condition and not by a theory. We know that this produce is raised all around the great cities, where the distress is greatest and the most general and the prices are the highest and the most unendurable. We know that the Government is already engaged at this moment in the transportation business on land and sea, by railroads and by ships. We know that we already have a parcel post which, beginning with a weight limit of 20 pounds in the more distant zones and 50 pounds in the first three zones, has within the past few weeks been raised to 70 pounds in the first three zones and 50 pounds all over the country, so that to-day by parcel post you can send merchandise not exceeding 50 pounds in weight from here to San Francisco if you want, and merchandise not exceeding 70 pounds in weight to any place not more than 150 miles distant from Washington.

I can not for the life of me see the difference between that proposition and this. This is nothing in the world but a country express service. If we are to transport merchandise on the trains to the people in the towns and from one town to another up to the weight limit of 70 pounds for the first 150 miles and 50 pounds for the entire country, what possible objection can there be on principle from doing exactly the same thing with motor trucks in the rural sections of the country, especially when great practical work is to be accomplished thereby and when the people of the great cities may have their cost of living reduced by the effort?

At any rate, Mr. President, we thought it was worth while, and the Post Office Department thought it was worth while, to ask the Senate to let the Post Office Department experiment with this matter. The Senate agreed more than a year ago that it would do it. The experiment has been delayed except so far as it could be conducted under the provisions of the law relating to star-route service, but the experiments directly authorized by Congress have been delayed because the proposition has not passed both Houses in one and the same bill.

I said just now this proposition had not only passed the Senate but it passed the House of Representatives only a few weeks ago as one of the sections of the Madden bill relating to increase of salary of employees of the Post Office Department, except that the House appropriated a sum three times as great as the Senate committee has recommended and, besides that, made a revolving fund out of all the funds which would come in from the operation of this service. We did not think a revolving fund was best and did not care particularly about how great the amount was. So we have reported it in the form in which it passed the Senate and for the same amount we put in when the Senate passed it before.

On principle, I can see no reason why this should not be done. The parcel post in connection with the rural route has not been the success we hoped for. The figures show that on each rural route, taking all the rural routes in the United States and averaging them up, there is only one parcel-post package a day. The result of too much parcel-post business is to slow the mails too much, and besides the expedition of the mail on rural routes has a tendency to discourage the slowness that is necessary to operate a freight express. So we concluded that it was wise and best and most practical to some extent to separate this service in the rural sections and endeavor to give to the country people and to the town people, too, because they get the benefit, a country express service exactly like we have provided for the people who live in towns and cities and who have railroad connection. That is all there is to it. It is only an experiment, and I think we can well afford to make it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I agree with the able Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] as to the good results which will come from this service. I am not opposed to the principle underlying this system which is sought to be established. I am in favor of the Government doing anything that the Government can properly do by which all the people or a greater majority of them may be benefited. I believe that governments are made for men rather than men for governments.

If this system will bring the farmer, the truck grower, closer to the consumer in the cities it benefits both parties to the transaction. The farmer gets a better price for the products of his soil, the consumer gets a better variety of food to eat and pays less for it. The only person who is injured by the establishment of this system of transportation is the middleman, who makes the profit on the goods he sells in the cities.

I hardly think it is an experiment. It has passed the experimental stage, and I hope sincerely that the amendment may be agreed to by the Senate. It is good for the farmer, better for the town man, and good for everybody.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I yield.

Mr. KING. I regret having been obliged to be absent from the Chamber and therefore am compelled to ask, Was the Senator from Mississippi just discussing section 7?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes; I was discussing section 7, the section with reference to motor trucks.

Mr. KING. Have any data been furnished to the Senate concerning the operations of the department under this plan?

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has just had read by the Secretary a statement from the Post Office Department, was it not, in regard to the matter?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It was a statement of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire if there is any other Senator who desires to speak on this matter?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know of anyone who desires to speak. I do not think it needs any argument.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I think it is a self-evident proposition and needs no argument.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that the Secretary has just read quite a long explanation of this whole subject, covering six or seven typewritten pages, which goes very fully into the whole question. I am sure, if the Senator from Utah would read that statement, he would quite agree that this is a proper provision in the bill.

I desire to say further, Mr. President, that this section does not carry any appropriation for this work. It merely authorizes the Postmaster General to expend $100,000 out of the postal revenues—that is all—in experimentation. It does not increase the appropriation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hardwick	McNary	Sherman
Bankhead	Henderson	New	Smoot
Beckham	Hollis	Norris	Sterling
Calder	Johnson, Cal.	Nugent	Sutherland
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Swanson
Culberson	Kellogg	Page	Thomas
Cummins	Kendrick	Phelan	Tillman
Curtis	Kenyon	Poindexter	Trammell
Fall	King	Pomerene	Underwood
Fernald	Kirby	Ransdell	Vardaman
France	Knox	Robinson	Weeks
Gallinger	Lenroot	Saulsbury	Willey
Gronna	Lewis	Shafroth
Hale	McKellar	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment, which is section 7.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have not had the privilege of reading this amendment until a moment ago, but it strikes me as a very extraordinary provision. It is called an experiment, and it certainly is an experiment in every sense of the word. A hundred thousand dollars is to be provided in this bill, at the expense of the taxpayers of the country, to carry garden truck from the farmers adjacent to the cities of the United States. It will be but a trifle of what will be necessary if we are going into this matter and do justice to all sections of the country; but it does seem to me that there is little if any foundation, for the contention that the Government ought to engage in this business.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator from New Hampshire allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. There will not be any loss from this appropriation. The report of the department shows that they have operated these six routes, which they have already had, and they are making a profit out of them. We are not going to spend any of the taxpayers' money in this business, no matter what other things may happen.

Mr. GALLINGER. They have got to take $100,000.

Mr. HARDWICK. But we will more than get it all back in the service that we are conducting from the operation of the business.

Mr. GALLINGER. Now, let me ask the Senator as to the modus operandi of this business. There is a farm, we will say, 20 miles outside of Washington, where a man is raising produce which the people of Washington are in need of and the Government hauls it into Washington. How is it then to be disposed of?

Mr. HARDWICK. It is to be transported to whomsoever it is consigned in Washington.

Mr. GALLINGER. To the individual family?

Mr. HARDWICK. To the individual, whether it be a merchant or a householder or what not.

Mr. GALLINGER. And who settles with the man who raises the produce?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is a matter entirely between the seller and the buyer.

Mr. GALLINGER. I presume it would be; but just how is the adjustment to be made?

Mr. HARDWICK. It might be made by money order or it might be made by check or in any other way; I do not know how.

Mr. GALLINGER. Can the Senator from Georgia tell me where these three routes are that are now in operation?

Mr. HARDWICK. There are six of them. One is from Baltimore to Philadelphia.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator must excuse me for asking the question. I did not hear the Senator's statement.

Mr. HARDWICK. I am glad to give the Senator the information. One of these routes is between Philadelphia and Baltimore and Annapolis and Washington; another from Baltimore to Solomons Island, Md.; another from Baltimore to Lancaster, Pa.; another from Washington to Leonardtown, Md.; another from Philadelphia to Atlantic City, N. J.; and another is between Washington and Frederick, Md., by way of Mount Airy, Md.

Mr. GALLINGER. Do I understand the Senator from Georgia that there has been a route established by the Government, and controlled by the Government, between Washington and Frederick, Md.?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. A route which carries produce into the city of Washington?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am glad to hear that. I never heard of it before. I might possibly have been patronizing it had I known of it.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator from New Hampshire will understand, I will say, if he did not hear the statement from the Post Office Department read, that the Post Office Department has established the six routes which I have been naming to the Senator under the provisions of the law authorizing star-route service.

Mr. GALLINGER. I had supposed that the star-route service related to the mails.

Mr. HARDWICK. Those routes do carry mail, but every one of them——

Mr. GALLINGER. And the Postmaster General has assumed authority to add a truck service to the mail service?

Mr. HARDWICK. Why should he not, when the law authorizes it?

Mr. GALLINGER. Why should he? The Postmaster General does not permit the rural carrier to carry anything of that kind on any route.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, yes; the law authorizes the carriage of parcels up to the 70-pound limit in the first three zones, or 300 miles, all over this country; and there have been no parcels carried on any one of these routes exceeding in weight that limit. They are held down to the limits of cost which are established by law for the carrying of parcels. They are merely transporting the parcels on these six routes in automobile trucks instead of on railroad trains.

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Senator from Georgia any statistics to show how much of this business has been done and what the profits, if any, have been?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes. I read them to the Senate before the Senator came in.

The average daily revenue as of May 4, 1918, based upon 3-cent rate first-class postage on the route from Baltimore to Solomons Island—we will take that, for example, as that is the one the Assistant Postmaster General uses. The average daily revenue has been $334.07; the average daily direct expense—gasoline, drivers, repairs, garage, which includes all actual costs paid—has been $12.45 as against $334.07. The indirect daily expense as of May 4, 1918, includes depreciation 33⅓ per cent on trucks, and interest 4 per cent, supervision, and so forth, $10.09. Total daily expense, $22.54. The receipts for 313 days were $104,563.91; and the annual expense direct for 313 days was $3,795.85. The annual expense indirect for 313 days—that is a year, of course, omitting Sundays—was $3,158.17. The total expenditure for a year of 313 days was $6,954.02, and the net revenue was $97,609.89.

That is just one of the routes. They are good money makers.

Mr. GALLINGER. Did the Senator say that was on one route?

Mr. HARDWICK. On one route. In fact, I think we shall be able to pay some of the salary increases for which we are providing if we let the Post Office Department do a little of this work.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia whether any allowance was made for depreciation?

Mr. HARDWICK. The allowance for depreciation was 33⅓ per cent. They carry this produce on motor trucks, and they have made a wonderful showing. I can not see that it is any more socialistic to have an express service running along the country roads, handling parcel-post business up to a 50 and 70 pound limit, than it is to have a parcel-post express going along on railroads from town to town or from city to city. The governmental principle is the same.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there is a good deal of force in that suggestion; but what surprises me is that the Government is engaged in an activity that is as profitable as the Senator from Georgia suggests this experiment has been. We assume governmental control of railroads, and immediately the cost to the public has been increased, while the service has been very much depreciated. That has been about the experience that other countries have had, as can easily be shown in the matter of governmental activity in the conduct of business.

Mr. HARDWICK. I quite agree with the Senator from New Hampshire, as he knows, in that regard, but let me tell the Senator what I think is the real explanation of that difference. These country express routes—I will call them that, so that the Senator may understand what I mean—traverse a territory and handle goods and produce of various sorts that otherwise would find no market at all in many cases, and that in other cases would have a more indirect and expensive method of transportation. Therefore I think they have attracted a good deal of business. I believe there is a great future for this service. I think it will really accomplish what we thought we were accomplishing when we established the rural parcel-post system.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very sorry to trouble the Senator from Georgia with questions——

Mr. HARDWICK. I am very glad to help the Senator from New Hampshire all I can.

Mr. GALLINGER. Because I ought to have heard his statement in the first place. I desire, however, to ask exactly how is this business conducted? The Government is in the business?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Government is making the profit?

Mr. HARDWICK. The Government is in the express business.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is in the express business. The Government sends trucks to Frederick, Md., and the produce of the farm and the garden is collected. Does the Government become in any way obligated so far as that produce is concerned?

Mr. HARDWICK. For its safe delivery?

Mr. GALLINGER. For its safe delivery. Does the Government invest anything in it? My thought is—and it is a practical thought—exactly what is the modus of getting the material from the producer to the consumer?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will tell the Senate what I know about it, and of course that is the best I can do. I imagine, and this is my imagination, and not my knowledge, for I have not inquired about it, but I presume they regulate the question of liability just as they do in the case of the parcel post. I think in the general parcel-post business a small extra charge is made when it is desired to guarantee safe carriage.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Insurance.

Mr. HARDWICK. Insurance, as my colleague from Alabama suggests. I assume that, of course, the same method would be applied, because it could be applied to this character of business.

The proposition, when it comes to its actual or practical working out, is this: Say a merchant in Frederick, Md., wants to consign to a merchant or a produce dealer or a market man here in Washington any considerable amount, or any amount of merchandise, any kind of merchandise, up to the weight limit; he merely sends it in this way, and makes whatever arrangement he pleases with his Washington customer, and in that way gets a somewhat better price—I presume the result will be that he will get a somewhat better price than he would at Frederick—and at the same time the Washington man could sell at a smaller price than heretofore prevailed at Washington. That is the theory of it; there probably would be some concession.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, does the Senator really think that the ultimate consumer is going to get any benefit out of it?

Mr. HARDWICK. I have no doubt of it, because the ultimate consumer can avail himself of the privilege afforded, and will undoubtedly do so when the service gets beyond the experimental stage. For instance, there are many country stores scattered around all the cities, and people who are shrewd and prudent about their household affairs could very well place orders with them for eggs, chickens, and other things and have them brought in over these routes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I know of an instance where a man living in the city has placed a regular order with a farmer in the country, and receives eggs, chickens, and vegetables in that way. They are brought to him three times a week.

Mr. GALLINGER. He can do that by parcel post now.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, he can do it by truck transportation; and, as I said a moment ago, it gives the town man better food; it gives the country man better prices, and it gives the town man cheaper prices than he would have to pay if he bought direct from a town dealer.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have had a little experience—not much—in regard to such matters in my own section of the country, and I have made the discovery that the average farmer now has a telephone and knows exactly what eggs, poultry, and other articles raised on his farm are worth in the nearest market; and if anyone is shrewd enough to get them from the farmer at a much less cost than he can get them at the nearest market, he has had better luck than I have had.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think the Senator is right about that; but the larger the supply, the lower the price is likely to be.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not pursue the matter. I am against Government ownership and shall vote against this section; but if it is agreed to, as probably it will be, I hope it will work as well as the Senator from Georgia contends it will.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Georgia a question.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator has the floor, and of course I will be glad to answer any question that I can in his time.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it proposed under section 7 that the transportation of products shall be confined to the Parcel Post System under the law as it now exists, or is there to be an authorization to engage in the transportation of products at the will of the Postmaster General?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will say to the Senator that I have no doubt myself that the department will be confined to the general law regulating the parcel post even under this section.

Mr. KELLOGG. Well, at this stage of the proceeding, does not the Senator think it would be wise to confine it to the parcel post—that is, to transportation as it is now carried on under the Parcel Post System? The Senator is aware that if Congress undertakes to establish a system for the transportation of all products from the producer to the consumers of this country, it will involve a task greater than carrying on the war.

Mr. HARDWICK. There must be limits to it, of course. I understood that they would apply the same limits and the same regulations to this form of transportation as are applied to the parcel post generally, whether the packages are transported on the railroads or street cars or steamboats or anything else; in other words, a 70-pound limit for the first three zones, or 300 miles, and 50 pounds for the remaining zones. I think the Senator will quite agree with me that logically there is no distinction between having a parcel post in the rural sections of the country and having a parcel post on the railroads between towns and cities. I can not draw the distinction between the two.

Mr. KELLOGG. I quite agree with the Senator; but that is not the point I am raising. I am asking whether this transportation that the Postmaster General is authorized to establish is to be confined to the Parcel Post System?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will tell the Senator. I think the language of the section ought not to be amended, because it is a mere experiment, and the Postmaster General is directed to report to Congress. I should like the Postmaster General to have some latitude when he is investigating. When it comes to enacting a permanent law, I quite agree with the Senator that we ought to establish the same limits here that we have established elsewhere; but while we are experimenting with the question and trying to get light I do not like to put express limits on the provision that might interfere with our getting the fullest light that is obtainable on the entire subject.

Mr. KELLOGG. I fully agree that the parcel post is a good thing, and I quite agree with the Senator that anything that facilitates transportation of produce from the farmers to the cities is a good thing; but it is transported now on the railways and to some extent on rural routes——

Mr. HARDWICK. Very little.

Mr. KELLOGG. Under the Parcel Post System. Now, if we are going to enlarge the system as to motor-truck deliveries, we will also have to enlarge it as to the railways, because we shall have to have the same system in existence as to the railways that we have as to motor trucks.

Mr HARDWICK. I would agree with the Senator about that if this were a proposition to establish the system permanently; but this is not a proposition to establish it permanently, but merely to authorize the experiment.

Mr. KELLOGG. But to experiment is to establish——

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

Mr. KELLOGG. And when it is established in some places every other place will have to have it.

Mr. HARDWICK. But, if the Senator will pardon me, there is only a limited amount of money appropriated; the Postmaster General is directed to report to Congress the result of the experiment, and the language of the section will not authorize any further expenditure as to the fiscal year covered by this bill. Therefore it is impossible that the section should grant authority for anything except for operations during the fiscal year covered by the bill, not to exceed in cost the limit fixed. The reason why I object to tying it down is because when we are experimenting and trying to get light, and are closely limiting the amount of the appropriation and the time during which the money can be expended, it looks to me as if we might tie it up a little too tight if we were to do more than leave it to the discretion of the Postmaster General.

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course, if the Government goes into the business of transporting products in competition with the railroads——

Mr. HARDWICK. It has already gone into that business.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is true——

Mr. HARDWICK. So that it should not be said "if the Government goes into the business," because it has already gone into it. If the Senator will pardon me for taking a little more of his time, the trouble is this: We thought we had established a Government express in the rural sections of this country in connection with the parcel-post law on rural routes, but the fact is we have not established any such service as that; the fact is that from the rural routes of this country to the offices which serve them there is coming to-day from the rural sections of the Republic only one package per day per route, showing that the service has utterly failed in doing what we expected of it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; that is quite right.

Mr. HARDWICK. Therefore we have got to try this, unless we are going to abandon the system.

Mr. KELLOGG. I did not intend to make a speech on the subject, but I wished to ask a few questions of the Senator, because I know he is thoroughly informed on the subject.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. Has the Government made any experiment to compare the cost, say between Baltimore and Philadelphia—I notice one of the routes has been established between those points—of transporting the mails and parcel post by this route with the cost on railroad routes?

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think so; but so far as I know they have not. They gave us the figures they have, which show how much direct expense for gasoline, drivers, oil, and such things as those has been incurred in operating these trucks; how much indirect expense, depreciation, and other items, that should properly be considered, was involved, and then they set against those items the total revenue obtained from the operation.

Mr. KELLOGG. But, so far as the Senator knows, no estimate or experiment has been made as to the comparative cost of the service by motor truck and railroad?

Mr. HARDWICK. I assume that when the experiment is made, if the Congress authorizes it, that the Government will be able to give us all the figures as the result of the experiment, and will be able to show us exactly what the service costs and how it compares with railroad costs, and everything else.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will permit me, I am still a little hazy about this matter, and I should like the Senator to clear up the fog. Will these trucks deliver produce to the householder?

Mr. HARDWICK. Wherever the produce is consigned to him; yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. The truck would go over the city as a huckster?

Mr. HARDWICK. It will go anywhere in Washington, as I understand, to any householder who wants it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will go into the huckster business, as a matter of fact?

Mr. HARDWICK. I imagine that anywhere along the line or at one of the terminals where a parcel is consigned the truck will deliver it.

Mr. GALLINGER. One other matter. As the Postmaster General figures it, there is a very large profit to the Government from the routes that have already been established, but does not that profit largely come from the sale of stamps for the carriage of mail?

Mr. HARDWICK. Some considerable part of it—I would have to examine the figures to know how much—comes from the carriage of mail.

Mr. GALLINGER. Outside of that, how does the Government get a profit? I may be stupid about this, but how does the Government derive revenue from it?

Mr. HARDWICK. By charging so much per pound for produce or merchandise that is hauled. That is where it gets the revenue.

Mr. GALLINGER. And collects it from——

Mr. HARDWICK. From the sender.

Mr. GALLINGER. From the man who sends it?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. GALLINGER. It goes to the farm and takes the package, weighs it, and collects the money?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think, if the Senator will look into it carefully, he will find that a very considerable portion of the money comes from the transportation of the mails. As I said a moment ago, I am entirely against the principle of the Government going into the business of the private citizen——

Mr. HARDWICK. Did the Senator favor the establishment of the parcel post?

Mr. GALLINGER. In a modified form; yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. What is the difference between this and that?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, that is a mail matter, largely.

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

Mr. GALLINGER. Originally it was.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator think so when it comes to 50 and 70 pound packages?

Mr. GALLINGER. We did extend the weight limit, and I think the system has worked out very well, but I can not see why it can not be utilized to do that business.

Mr. HARDWICK. It can——

Mr. GALLINGER. I can not see why we should have another instrumentality.

Mr. HARDWICK. It can, so far as it reaches the places where this business is waiting to be done; but this is a proposition to apply to the rural sections immediately adjacent to some of our larger cities the same system that we apply between railroad station and railroad station.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is no rural station that has not some system of mail delivery.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; but the trouble has been, if the Senator will pardon me for repeating, that there has been such a tendency to slow up the mails if much parcel-post business is handled on the rural routes that the people who are patrons of the routes—or possibly it is because the carriers in some cases discourage it—have not used the Government express service known as the rural parcel post, for, as I said a little while ago, there is only one package a day on each route. This provision is designed to give them a freight service that will not necessarily be hampered by too great a connection with the mail service.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think I have asked all the questions I wished to ask.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, section 7 of this bill, in my opinion, is filled with lurking dangers and the possibilities of serious consequences in the precedent which it will establish. Sometimes measures, not only innocent on their face but apparently altruistic, bearing the legend for the "public weal" are pregnant with the greatest dangers, and sow the seeds of political and social destruction. Indeed, some of the most baneful legislation has been clothed in the most beautiful colors. It has come as if it were "gifts from the Greeks," and the people have forgotten the old saying to beware of Greeks when they come bearing gifts. In the experience of most Senators they will recall measures that received support upon the pretext that they were for the benefit of the people, and yet it soon became manifest that the measures were hurtful to the last degree. It is claimed that this section provides for the conservation of food products and to facilitate the collection and delivery thereof from producer to consumer. The section then provides that the Postmaster General is authorized to conduct experiments in the operation of motor vehicle truck routes in the vicinity of such cities of the United States as he may select, and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, and there is a further provision that he shall report the result of such experiments to the Congress. This, it would seem, is an experiment, and yet, as it appears from the report submitted by the Senator from Georgia emanating from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, experiments have been conducted between near-by cities and under the most favorable auspices. Of course, I appreciate that it is difficult for one, not a member of the committee which has had this bill and all the questions involved under investigation, to discuss it intelligently. The committee has spent weeks and months in the consideration of the questions presented by this measure. They know all that can be said in favor of the propositions contained in the bill, and have anticipated any possible objection that can be urged against them. I can only submit a few thoughts gathered from my own experience and try to apply the fundamental principles of legislation and of governments, as I comprehend them, to the proposition and theories and schemes contained in proposed legislation. I know that the able Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] is a profound student of our Government and of constitutional question, and I am a humble follower of the Senator in his interpretations, in his construction of the Constitution, and particularly as it applies to the powers and functions of the Federal Government, its rights, and its limitations, and the powers and prerogatives of the States, and the rights which the people have reserved to themselves. I confess that I am frequently surprised, if not shocked, at the evident purpose of many leaders in political thought to change not only the letter and form but also the spirit of our Government.

We do not often nowadays speak of the Federal Government as a Government of enumerated and limited powers. There is seldom a defense of the rights of the States and an exposition of the powers of the States which is in conformity with the voice of the fathers. We seldom speak of the individual as sovereign, as the chief unit in our form of government, of the important necessity of developing self-initiative and the strong and virile individualism which develops character and produces men and women competent to bear the burdens of local self-government and to enjoy and carry forward the purpose of a true democracy. In my limited study of the Constitution of our country, of its history, and of its development I have reached the conclusion that the functions of government are materially different from the activities of the individual. Freedom and liberty and genuine progress result from the development of the individual. The struggle in all the ages has been to put hooks in the jaws of individuals and governments that sought despotic power. Progress and civilization are the sunlight coming from the darkness of autocratic centralized government. When government controlled everything there was ignorance and poverty and servitude for the people, resulting from a cruel and oppressive absolutism. As men were freed from the domination of governments and permitted to go out into the field of individual effort there arose within them hopes and aspirations and ambitions which led them into a fairer and brighter day. Kings and rulers and emperors of antiquity controlled all enterprises, directed the efforts and labors and lives of their subjects, and gathered the products of their toil and their labor, built the roads and highways and bridges, controlled all transportation facilities, became the dispensers of all gifts, denied individual initiative, private endeavor, prevented personal development, stifled the hopes and joys and ambitions that lead to liberty and manhood, and covered the nations, the millions of their groaning subjects, with the dark mantle of omnipotent power. Even in Cæsar's time the government built and controlled the highways and all means of transportation. The government was the godfather, bestowing its gifts and placing its burdens as it chose. For centuries Rome was a huge autocracy or a tyrannous paternalism. It gathered the crops and brought them to Rome to feed the people, it laid its paralyzing and clammy hand upon the individual, dwarfed him into littleness, and robbed him of that spirit of independence which is the glory of uplifted manhood, and prepared him for the conquest of the wild hordes that poured out of the north and over the Alps into the fertile fields and plains of Italy. We hear around us constantly the old cries of governmental ownership and governmental control, of the necessity of the Government controlling business and taking charge of the industrial life and economic concerns of the people. And when the cries of war are loudest these demands for governmental usurpation are strongest.

Mr. President, I believe that the Government as it came from the fathers is the greatest and best Government that the world has ever seen. I believe that our form of government has never been surpassed, and that under it there will come the greatest progress and the greatest liberty and the highest advancement of which humanity is capable. In my opinion, when we depart from the spirit that animated the fathers and that finds expression in our Constitution such departure will be attended with dangers, and if persisted in will end in disaster. This Republic was made possible because of the independence, the courage, and individualism of those who founded it. They believed that governments had their sphere of activity and that they should be strictly limited to the orbit prescribed for them. They learned from the dark and somber pages of history the importance of individual freedom and the possession of a broad field for individual effort. They were not asking the Government for power or humbly beseeching the Government for gifts and bounties and gratuities, and to assume the burdens and responsibilities of private individuals and of private enterprise. They saw a continent before them; they saw that States were to be builded, rivers were to bridged, streams were to be harnessed, factories were to be erected, and towns and cities and sovereign States to be established. With courage and bravery and those lordly qualities that develop strongly in the Anglo-Saxon race they builded the great structure in which we live. There are those now who would tear down what they have builded. It is brutal iconoclasm that is attempted. This measure which we are now discussing is but a little thing, it is merely a straw upon the surface, but it is one of those symptoms which so often appear now in legislation. It shows that there is a disease invading the Nation.

Mr. President, it needs no prophetic power to prognosticate that when any Government lays its hand upon the private enterprises and activities and pursuits of the people, and takes over the business of the people and controls the sources and fountains of production and distribution, it means paralysis, atrophy, stagnation, and ultimately industrial and political destruction. A paternalistic form of government or a socialism, whether it be called the purified socialism spoken of by Dr. Scaffle, or Marxian socialism, or the extreme, poisonous, revolutionary, and nihilistic socialism of some Germanistic and Russian schools in our country, was not made for a free people.

It is the antithesis of our majestic Republic. Industrial or political liberty, when enjoyed, and if enjoyed, then lost, are not overthrown in a day or in a year. Socialistic attacks are always insidious; so also are bureaucratic and paternalistic assaults. Intrigues develop slowly, but move with dynamic and persistent effort. There are so many excuses and pretexts urged, so many of them plausible and alluring, for governmental control of matters and questions that are purely local or exclusively within the realm of individual effort! In this hour, when war is upon us and when the products of mill and mine and farm are mounting in cost to the consumer, to urge a proposition which it is claimed will cheapen the price to the consumer is to make a prima facie case. The question is asked, Do we not need transportation facilities? Is it not desired to have food products brought to the cities and the products of the mill and the factory taken to the doors of the consumer? The answer, of course, is in the affirmative. The conclusion, then, it is asserted, is inevitable and irresistible that the Government should assume this duty.

Mr. President, I do not have the time nor would it be profitable to enter into a philosophical or political discussion of individualism and collectivism, or the question of social justice and the duty of the State to interpose in the interests of social welfare. Of course, extreme individualism is not found in our democratic form of government. Social justice, to secure the rights of the individual and the rights of the people was the object of this Republic, and the maintenance of those rights will best be secured by the adherence to the form and the spirit of our Federal Constitution.

Addressing myself to the question before us, I venture to assert that the same reason which would justify the Government embarking upon the business contemplated in the committee amendment would warrant the Government in undertaking the performance of substantially any private business. Already this wave of State socialism is finding expression in demands made by some that the Government shall take over all of the coal mines and own and operate them. Some of the proponents of these schemes do not seem to understand that these great properties possess value, and that to deprive the owners of their properties they must be compensated for the same. They seem to forget that there could be compensation only by taxation and that the people would have to bow their necks to meet the burdens that such taxation would involve.

A distinguished Member of the other branch of Congress has demanded that the Federal Government take over and operate the copper mines. Let us pause to inquire who is to pay for them, where are the vast sums to come from with which to discharge the obligation which would result from such a course? Perhaps some who are demanding this policy would go a step further and insist that the Government rob the owners of their property. It is insisted by many that the Government shall acquire, by purchase or otherwise, all sources of power for the generation of electric energy and build hydroelectric plants and furnish power to the people. Still others insist that the National Government shall take over, own, and operate all packing plants, all warehouses, particularly those used for storage of grain, all steel and iron plants, all powder factories, all manufacturing plants employed in producing agricultural implements, all factories engaged in the production of aeroplanes, automobiles, woolen and cotton fabrics. Some insist that the lumber industry should be owned and controlled by the Government; and there is a swelling chorus that the Government shall own and control all railroads, not only the transcontinental and trunk lines, but subsidiary, and even interurban railroad lines, all canals, and all means of transportation whatever. It will be said that this scheme is so stupendous that it becomes preposterous, and yet it is manifest that if the Nation embarks upon the plan of governmental ownership and control of enterprises or pursuits that belong to the domain of individual effort, that if the Government goes outside of the field of governmental function and once enters the domain of private enterprise, no one can determine what the end will be. The dam that holds back the great reservoir is not secure if only a little stream finds its way through the crevice or some interstice in the structure. The development of transportation facilities in the United States during the past 50 years has been unprecedented in the history of any nation. We have nearly 300,000 miles of steam railroads; there are thousands, and, indeed, tens of thousands, of miles of interurban railroads. These great transportation companies have been the result of private endeavor.

The American business man is courageous and adventuresome. The American business man loves an enterprise calling for skill and courage and daring. The hope of reward, the desire to do big things have been incentives leading to the establishment of great industrial enterprises in our country. If the Government enters into the field of private endeavor, of course, it crowds out the individual, destroys further effort upon his part. Who would build railroads in the United States now, either steam or electric? It is true the electric roads have not yet been taken over by the Government, but with this rising tide of socialism no one would venture the construction of an interurban road of any consequence. Who would dare to develop big coal fields or great copper mines or great hydroelectric plants when the threatening hand of the Government is raised above his head? A policy that leads to these demands for Government control and ownership of the enterprises and industries of the country will paralyze business and bring distress, if not bankruptcy, to the people. One of the reasons that has led to the rapid extension of interurban roads in our country has been the desire of getting the freight from the rural districts and of serving the farms and the suburban population. There is no question but what the interurban railroads have been of immense benefit to the people. They have linked remote parts of the States together and have brought the farm and the rural population into close relation with the cities. Their operation has resulted in reducing freight rates and passenger rates. Indeed they have seriously cut into the profits of the steam railroads. Transportation facilities follow the demands of the people. The railroad goes where there is trade and traffic. If a new oil or coal field is opened up, the railroad speedily enters it. Out in the deserts of the West if a mine is discovered of any magnitude a railroad is soon there and the ore is carried to smelter and mill for the benefit of all. But, as I stated, if the Government takes over the transportation facilities of the country there will be no further effort by private enterprise to find investment in this field.

I recall that a number of years ago in my own State an interurban railroad was constructed from the capital of the State to Ogden, a city 40 miles to the north, and later the road was continued from Ogden to the northern part of the State, and within the past two or three years an electric road has been constructed from the capital southerly for more than 80 miles. These roads pass through farming sections, and have proved of great advantage to the agriculturist. They cheapened freight and passenger rates within the State, and were particularly beneficial to the farmers. Under a proper policy these and other interurban roads will be extended, and private enterprise will provide the necessary transportation facilities to meet the demands of the people. It is no answer to say that private enterprise has not in the past fully accomplished this. That may be true, but yet the growth of our country and the products of farm and field and mine have not been sufficiently great to warrant the construction of these instrumentalities to every part of our land. As stated, transportation facilities come as the needs of the people demand. The great State of Montana a few years ago was regarded as only fit for the grazing of cattle and because of its mineral production. It has now developed into a great agricultural State. Cities and towns are yearly being builded. Railroads and transportation facilities will be extended into all parts of the State to meet the needs of the people; and so it is in other States and in all sections of our land. In many parts of our country farmers have organized for the purpose of caring for their products and transporting them to the points of consumption. In California the orange growers, those who produce lemons and grapes and olives and other tropical and semitropical fruits, have formed associations to handle, care for, and transport the products of their vineyards and orchards and fields.

The American people can be trusted to meet their economic and social needs. They will build factories and develop industries and create transportation instrumentalities whenever and as soon as they are required. I might say in passing that if the Government shall enter into the business of conveying from farm and field and mine and factory all of the products of the people and distribute them at the points of consumption, millions of men will be required, hundreds of millions of dollars will be needed for the required transportation facilities, and an annual outlay of hundreds of millions of dollars will result, and in carrying out this project the railroads, now controlled by the Government, will be robbed of much freight and the Government will pro tanto be deprived of revenue which the railroads otherwise would have earned, and thus the deficit for operating the railroads will be augmented.

Mr. President, it is claimed in the report just read that the experiment so far conducted shows a profit to the Government. That is quite possible. I remember a few years ago, when a number of gentlemen wanted to get a franchise for a street railway company, that they secured figures showing the number of people that would be carried between two populous districts of the city. Of course, the number of passengers carried between such points would be great and the profits large. They did not show the great expense of operating a street car system into other parts of the city, nor mention the small number of passengers that would be carried in sparsely settled portions when the road was to be extended. Some railroads in this city are prosperous. Others that extend into the rural districts are unprofitable.

So it is here. The Postmaster General has selected, as the report indicates, routes between Philadelphia and Baltimore, between Annapolis and Washington, between Baltimore and Solomons Island, Md., between Baltimore and Lancaster, Pa., between Washington and Leonardtown, Md., between Philadelphia and Atlantic City, and between Washington and Frederick by way of Mount Airy. Within this area there are millions of people, the roads are excellent, and everything is conducive to economy and to cheapness in transportation.

Of course, between these points trucks could be run at a minimum of expense and a maximum of freight, and conditions highly favorable. I can conceive of a motor truck carrying freight between two large cities, or along a route where there are a large number of farmers who have a vast amount of products which they desire to send to market, and yielding large profits on the investment. There is no doubt but what in many instances it would be profitable for the Government to engage in the freight business by means of motor trucks, but when it goes beyond the thickly populated districts, beyond the favored points, out into the agricultural districts of the States, and attempts to establish the system in the country generally, then a different result will follow. The costs on such circumstances would be enormous, the receipts less, and the Government in the end would have a deficit.

So that, to my mind, these figures tendered to us, based upon the routes which have been suggested, are meaningless. They do not prophesy profits to the Government if a general plan is inaugurated. They are not fair for the purpose of determining whether this system is going to be profitable or unprofitable. Without being so intended, they are descriptive, and will lead to baseless conclusions.

Mr. President, it seems to me that if you start upon this scheme, just as the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has suggested, as an experiment, leaving to the Postmaster General, or those who are called upon, to carry out this plan, the determination of where the routes will be, they are bound, not necessarily unfairly or dishonestly, to make a good schedule that will yield a profit if possible, and present to Congress a good balance sheet. It would be foolish for them to do otherwise. They are going to take the cream, if I may be permitted the expression, of the country to justify the scheme. They are going to select those points where there will be a profit, if it is humanly possible to produce a profit. They are not going to impose the system upon the rural districts, upon districts where the population is not congested, upon districts where the roads are bad, or where there are difficulties to be encountered. They are going to select the best roads, in the most favored sections, where there will be the most freight, and where there will be possibly the least competition, and, of course, under the favorable conditions selected by them they are bound to present a favorable balance sheet.

But, if we start this system, what does it mean? If the farmers in Calvert County, in which Solomons Island is located, or in Frederick County have the right to have the Government carry their produce into Washington, then the farmers in the State of Minnesota will have an equal right to have the Government come to their homes and collect their freight and garden truck and agricultural products and transport the same to the centers where it is consumed; and the Senator from South Dakota and the Senator from New Hampshire will be importuned by their constituents to procure motor-truck routes to meet their demands. They will say in substance that if the people of Maryland, in the vicinity of Washington, and the people in the vicinity of New York and Philadelphia, are entitled to have the Government send vehicles or other means of transportation to their farms every day to gather the milk and the butter and the vegetables and take them to the cities, why should not we, far removed from the centers of population and from the Capital of the Nation, have the same privileges?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. I notice that the scheme of the Postmaster General, in his recommendations, is not to include any of the country west of the Mississippi River.

Mr. KING. Of course not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This is not anything more than an extension of the present parcel-post system. Replying to the suggestions of the Senator from Utah, all over this country, from every courthouse, from every town, the parcel-post system now goes out, regularly organized and regulated by the Post Office Department. I venture the assertion that there is not a courthouse or a town of 500 or 1,000 people in this country along a railroad that has not a rural route running out every day, carrying and bringing parcel post, extending itself to every community. This is simply a proposition to relieve the congestion that the regular parcel post, under its present operations, can not meet; that is all. There is no appropriation made here. The amendment simply permits the Post Office Department to expend $100,000 from its postal revenues, coming perhaps from the very receipts from bringing in these parcels.

If the Senator will excuse me one minute further——

Mr. KING. Yes; to be sure. I am glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Take one of these established routes that the Postmaster General talks about: What is the process? They do not go out and go to a farmer's house and say: "If you have any eggs or chickens or butter or vegetables, we will take them in for you"; but they will establish stations along that route, perhaps every mile, or at convenient places, just as they establish mail boxes now for the rural mail service.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator from Utah will allow me——

Mr. KING. Certainly; I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. But it is not proposed, under this bill, to confine the transportation to the present system of parcel post. If it is, why not say so in the bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no objection to saying that, Mr. President; but I did not suppose anybody would conceive that the Post Office Department would go beyond their regulations, made in pursuance of law, with reference to the parcel post. I thought perhaps everybody would assume that the Post Office Department would confine itself in its operations and its regulations to the law as it now exists; that is all.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not only that, but we have left it to the Postmaster General to raise the weight limit whenever he wants to. He has raised it once, almost doubled it, within the past few weeks, and he can raise it again. So, after all, it is a matter of discretion with the Post Office Department, even as to the things established by law.

Mr. KELLOGG. So far as the limit is concerned, yes; that is true.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, for fear some Senator may misunderstand the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, let me say that that discretion is not given to the Postmaster General in this bill. It is given in the original parcel-post law, which has been in operation for years.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not be diverted by anything that the Senator from Alabama says into a discussion of the parcel post. This bill calls the scheme which we are discussing "an experiment." It is not the parcel post extended; but whatever label may be placed upon it, it does not command my support.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I just wanted to give the Senator a little information.

Mr. KING. I am very glad to receive it, because I stated at the outset that, not being a member of the committee reporting this bill, I did not have the advantage that the members of the committee had in the way of investigating this subject. This proposed legislation is sought to be justified by reference to the parcel post.

Mr. President, if it is a proper function of the Government and if it be wise and proper to embark the Nation upon the scheme of transporting all of the people's products from the producer to the consumer, why not inaugurate it in those sections of the country where it will accomplish the most good and serve those who suffer most from lack of transportation facilities? If the Government is going into the business of carrying the food products of the farmers to the consumer, why not install this system in some of the great agricultural districts of the country? Why not apply it in Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and some of the States beyond the Mississippi River?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, it is already installed in all of them.

Mr. KING. Then, if it is installed, why appropriate $100,000 for an "experiment"?

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, we do not appropriate $100,000 at all.

Mr. KING. I have understood the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Alabama to say that this was an "experiment."

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly.

Mr. KING. If it is an experiment, then it is untried, new.

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

Mr. KING. A tried system, one that is in operation, is not an experiment.

Mr. HARDWICK. But the Senator wants to extend this service to the people in all of these States. Now, of course, the Senator ought not to take that position, because this is impartial with respect to the whole country, and it is not fair to suppose that the Postmaster General will not apply it impartially to the country. As far as the parcel post is concerned, with its 50 and 70 pound weight limits, the Government transportation of freight, against which the Senator is inveighing, is already in force throughout this Republic by law. This is merely a different method of handling it; that is all.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is being insisted that no appropriation is made for this purpose. If $100,000 is diverted from the revenues of the Post Office Department, is not that equivalent to an appropriation? In other words, if it is not used for that purpose it will be a surplus that will go into the Treasury.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly if this experiment were conducted at a total loss it would come out of the postal funds, and in a way that would be indirectly at the expense of the taxpayers; but I do not think it is fair to assume that there is going to be any loss when the experiments so far show a large profit, and, of course, unless there is a loss in the establishment of these routes, there will be no expense attached to anybody.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will permit a further observation, I am very clearly of the opinion that if this is to go along the same line that the Rural Delivery Service has gone, and is extended into the rural districts, there will be a loss. We all know that when we established the Rural Delivery System we thought we would confine it to a small section of the country; but immediately every community demanded it, and practically every community in the United States has it at the present time. I do not for the life of me understand why this is confined to the territory east of the Mississippi River.

Mr. HARDWICK. Not at all. If the Senator from New Hampshire will permit me, and the Senator from Utah——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. HARDWICK. The proposition is, and I think it is pretty clearly stated in express language, that this experiment shall be conducted within a reasonable radius or circuit of the larger cities—North, East, South, and West. I do not suppose there is to be any partiality or favoritism in the matter. I certainly would not make that assumption, and I hope the Post Office Department would not be guilty of it. But it is not to duplicate existing rural routes, of course.

I suppose that one of these routes, with a circuit, possibly, of 100 miles, would touch and cut perhaps a dozen rural routes or more. It is a freight service from the rural sections of the country to these cities—the larger cities particularly—and I think it is well worth trying in these times of high prices and high cost of living.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if this is merely the parcel post, then why this appropriation and why this "experiment"? This plan contemplates, when perfected, the purchase of hundreds of thousands of motor trucks, the securing of all kinds of transportation instrumentalities, the employment of tens of thousands of drivers, agents, car repairers, and other servants necessary to carry out the plan; the establishment of machine and repair shops, the creation of new bureaus, more governmental machinery—all of which will demand tens of millions of dollars annually, with the usual result—imperfect and expensive service and loss to the Government.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] states that this plan is largely to serve the rural districts in the neighborhood of the cities, if I correctly understood him; that this bill necessarily will destroy, in a measure, the profits of the interurban railroad lines. We all know that the interurban railroad lines now and for a number of years have been laboring under many difficulties and many burdens.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will again pardon me, if the Senator will go to the Post Office Department he will find that the Postmaster General or his associate dealing with this matter insists that he has been able to put these routes in operation in territory where they were not served by any transportation facilities at all, either railroads or other lines, I should think. While I do not hold any brief—and I know the Senator does not—for these interurban carriers, I should think the first duty of the Government would be to try to select territory that was not otherwise served for the purpose of the experiment.

Mr. KING. The routes pointed out in the report submitted by the Post Office Department show that they are all in a thickly populated part of the country. The amount appropriated for this "experiment" will preclude the extension of the scheme to other points, or, if to others, to comparatively a few only.

Mr. President, if the scheme were wise and prudent in peace times, it is unsound and improper now. We require all of our resources for the war; all the trucks that can be produced for military purposes. We need all men in the Army, or in the production of the things necessary for the Army, for our allies, and for the American people. We are restricting production in nonessentials. We need all our resources of men and treasures and material things for the war. This is no time for experiments.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of the fact that the Postmaster General has figured out a very considerable profit to the Government on the routes that he has established, does not the Senator think that the Postmaster General ought to deduct the amount received from postage, inasmuch as they carry letters and newspapers on these routes?

Mr. KING. Most certainly, I answer the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Because if they were not carried in this way they would be carried in other ways, without any additional cost to the Government.

Mr. KING. There is no question but that the Senator is right.

Mr. GALLINGER. The showing is really a very fallacious one in that regard, to say the least.

Mr. KING. I think the figures submitted here by the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General are fallacious and support a view which is sophistical. I do not think they fairly present the case. I think they are misleading and will produce erroneous conclusions. I object now to a policy that projects the Government of the United States persistently and constantly into the private activities of the people, a policy that lays the clammy, paralyzing hand of the Federal Government upon individual initiative and upon enterprises that should be and will be carried on by the people when the war is ended; and when we come to the consideration of the mighty problems that will then demand solution we can then consider this question more fully upon its merits. If the Parcel Post System has failed to meet the expectations of the people and it is deemed proper to extend its operations, that can be done. If the Government is to be the owner and operator of all railroads and all transportation instrumentalities, then a broad and comprehensive scheme will have to be worked out. But now we are at war. Every dollar we need for war. Economy in all things else, but ample money to fight the war to a glorious and a triumphant end.

I hope the committee amendment will not be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to decide.

Mr. HARDWICK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. GOFF] by reason of illness.

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. ROBINSON] on public business.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. BECKHAM. I announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], is detained by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending amendment is section 7 of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I desire to make a short statement in reference to the provisions of the proposed amendment and the purpose intended to be accomplished by it. It is nothing more nor less than the extension or enlargement of the present service as it is now operated by the Post Office Department in the rural service of the country, that goes out from every town in the country, as I have formerly expressed it.

The purpose of this amendment is to relieve as far as possible the congestion that still surrounds the larger cities and towns of the country and to extend the operations of the parcel post under the conditions and regulations prescribed by the Post Office Department that apply to the parcel post as it is now operated. There is no purpose on the part of the department, and could be no purpose on the part of the department, to make some new departure and to engage in the transportation of some kind that is not authorized by the law establishing the parcel post and its regulation as it is now operated.

It is the purpose of the Post Office Department, if these experiments are successful, if they meet the conditions that they are intended to meet, and if they serve the purposes that they are intended to serve at a profit to the Government or at least without loss to the Government, to extend them to other communities and cities over the country where like conditions exist. For instance, as I recall the letter from the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, it proposes to establish two or more of these systems in the city of St. Paul, a number of others in the Western States, and a number in the Southern States, or wherever the conditions warrant or justify the experiment.

No one proposes to appropriate any money out of the Treasury for these experiments. The bill provides that the Post Office Department may expend $100,000 of the postal revenues, and I assume, and I think it is fair to assume, that the $100,000 will come from profits accruing in the operation of the system which the department seeks to inaugurate, because their experiments already show and the official figures show that it is exceedingly profitable.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Then, I understand this is in the nature of an experiment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; purely.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, if the experiment does not prove successful, the subsidy will be discontinued?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly; I think it ought to be.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator undertake to guarantee that it will be discontinued in case it should not be successful?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I could not do that, but I say to the Senator I will guarantee, as far as the Senate is concerned, that there will be no further effort on the part of the Senate to provide any funds for additional experiments.

Mr. HARDWICK. The department could not carry it on because the appropriation of $100,000 is simply made for the coming fiscal year.

Mr. BORAH. But would the Senator contend that Congress should continue to appropriate notwithstanding the fact that it had not proved very successful?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am sure I would not be in favor of the continuation of the appropriation.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. KING. In reply to the Senator from Idaho, I can assure him from figures which will be produced, based upon the plans now in the mind of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, it will show a profit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope so.

Mr. KING. They are bound to produce a profit because this scheme is to be superimposed upon us between two different points in a congested part of the country where there is an abundance of agricultural products. Between these favorable points and under the most favorable conditions there is bound to be a profit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am sure the Senator from Utah would not care to have the Government establish a service like this on all the rural routes of the country, of which there are 40,000. There is no more necessity for that than there is for building a railroad along each one of the rural routes.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will allow me, I will say that I do not regard the establishment of this system, at least at the present time and under the conditions now prevailing, as wise or expedient. Moreover, the question of the proper functions of the Government is one that can not be ignored.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I see the Senator has that view of it exactly. It is his contention that you ought not to establish it in the congested districts and around the cities unless you are going to give the entire country the benefit of it. That is what he says. Now, how are you going to do that? If this experiment is not a successful one it ought to be discontinued, and I have no doubt it will be successful.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to inquire of the Senator from Alabama in charge of the bill if it is not the object of section 7 to promote direct dealing between producer and consumer in farm products as far as possible?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the purpose.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that is a very important matter. It ought to be done.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no question about that being the real purpose and effect.

Mr. FLETCHER. It seems to me to provide for facilitating the collection and delivery thereof of food products from producer to consumer directly is the object. I think it highly important that some provision of this sort be made.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield? In view of what the Senator said, I assume he feels that the Government should take over all transportation facilities, that the Government should embark, for instance, upon the business of handling the freight and operating all the transportation agencies of the country, and see to it that every farmer in every remote part of the country, every cotton planter, every live-stock producer, and all others who produce anything that enters into human consumption or use, should have railroads or canals or motor trucks to carry to market all these varied products.

Mr. McKELLAR. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. FLETCHER. May I answer that, if the Senator will allow me? I, of course, do not go to that extent. The observations of the Senator would seem to lead us into an absurdity. This only applies to such articles as may be carried by parcel post, small packages of products of the farm. Instead of going to some market place or being peddled about, a relation can be established between the housekeeper in the city and the producer on the farm. I think conveyances may be made of the product by parcel post, and it seems to me to be entirely within the field of the activity of the Post Office Department.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield? Does the Senator know in various parts of the United States they are carrying coal, sugar, lumber, live animals, and everything that can be conceived of by parcel post?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is done by the existing law by the parcel post, and it will be done right on whether we pass this proposition or not.

Mr. BORAH. What is the necessity of this provision if all these other things are already provided for.

Mr. HARDWICK. I will tell you. The parcel post in the rural sections has not been a success from the country into the town. It has averaged but one package per day.

Mr. BORAH. That is supposed to be the case around the large cities?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. The idea is to get garden contents immediately to the people in the cities?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes; to see if they could not cut the cost of living to some extent in the great centers of population, where the need is greatest.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am in favor of this section 7, and I call the attention of the Senate to its provisions. I also want to take issue with my distinguished friend from Utah [Mr. KING] again about the principle involved in it. Several days ago the Senator from Utah opposed another section of the bill. I said it seemed to me then that he was putting himself across the path of progress, and with all due respect to him I believe that that is exactly what he is doing when he opposes this section.

Since that colloquy took place several days ago between the distinguished Senator and myself on this subject I have had occation further to investigate, and I find upon investigation that the Senator from Utah is now lined up with some other very distinguished authorities in this country. Upon an examination of the Congressional Globe of 1872 and 1873 I find that such men as Senators Anthony, of Rhode Island; Carpenter, of Wisconsin; Chandler, of Michigan; Morrill, of Vermont; Allen G. Thurman, of Ohio; and Senator Tipton, of Nebraska, discussed a similar question in this body, and several of them were on the side the Senator is now taking. The particular question that arose at that time was wireless telegraphy, and I believe all those Senators pursued the matter in the same vein that the Senator from Utah pursues this matter. They laughed at it; they scorned it; they said it was absolutely impossible, and applied many epithets to it, and even quoted poetry about it, just as the Senator from Utah quoted poetry about aircraft two or three days ago on a similar subject. However, since 1873 we have found that those objecting Senators were wrong, just as I think the distinguished Senator is now, and wireless telegraphy is one of the most useful inventions of the present day, notwithstanding their jokes and jibes and opposition.

I think it will be interesting to the Senate; I am not going to read excerpts from the speeches of those gentlemen at that time about wireless telegraphy, but I am going to ask unanimous consent of the Senate to insert some very short excerpts from the debate that took place in the Senate in 1873 on what was then called the Loomis aerial telegraph. I am sure that tomorrow morning Senators will find it very interesting reading, especially when viewed in connection with this and similar provisions in the bill.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LOOMIS AERIAL TELEGRAPH CO.

The next bill on the calendar was the bill (H. R. 772) to incorporate the Loomis Aerial Telegraph Co.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, that bill is reported upon, I believe, adversely; but I saw the Senator (not now in his seat) who had charge of the report, who says that he has no objection to its passage. It is simply to incorporate a company for an invention of telegraphing. There is a man in this city who thinks he has invented, and some other people think he has invented, a new system of telegraphing which will be much cheaper—I do not know that anything can be more expeditious—than the existing system, and he simply asks for an act of incorporation. I think we had better give it to him.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What is the scope of it? Is it a charter for the District of Columbia or for the United States?

Mr. ANTHONY. A charter for a company. It is a company to be incorporated, I suppose, to sell the patent right. It is for telegraphing without the intervention of wires, telegraphing without any material communication between the points. I have listened to the inventor's story. I do not wish to repeat it, for I do not think there will be time to do so before we shall adjourn for to-day. I think the scheme is as absurd as anything I ever heard except the invention of Morse. The existing telegraphic invention was, everybody agreed, the most absurd thing that could be conceived. We know what that invention is now, and I am in favor of giving this poor fellow a chance and see if he can do something. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does he live here?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; he is a citizen of this District.

Mr. SCOTT. The bill has passed the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask that the first section of that bill may be reported again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first section will be read again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That Mahlon Loomis, Alexander Elliott, jr., and William N. Chamberlain, of Washington, D. C.; P. R. Ammidon, of Boston, Mass.; and Isaiah Lukens, of Delaware, and their associates and successors, are hereby incorporated and made a body politic and corporate by the name of the Loomis Aerial Telegraph Co., and by that name may sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, in any court of law or equity of competent jurisdiction, and may have and use a common seal, and be entitled to use and exercise all the powers, rights, and privileges incident to such corporation: Provided, That the corporate powers created by this act shall not be exercised by said company within any State except by the consent of the legislature of such State, and under such rules and regulations as such State may prescribe."

Mr. THURMAN. I believe that is the only section that gives any corporate power, and I suggest to my friend from Rhode Island whether it really confers any corporate powers at all.

Mr. CONKLING. It authorizes them to telegraph and be telegraphed to, does it not?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know what corporate powers are granted by that bill. I wish the Senator from Rhode Island to understand that I am not going to object to the consideration of this bill, because I was understood at the last session to oppose its consideration for which I got blown up by the Senator and also by the promoter of the bill. [Laughter.] And I do not intend to be blown up again. Now, I want to perfect this measure as well as I can, which, I am assured by the promoter of it, the discoverer of some new mode of telegraphing, will enable him to telegraph all around the world without any wires at all, with not the slightest necessity for a cable or anything of that kind. I have not the least objection to his doing it; and if so great a feat as that can be performed, and we have the power to grant an act of incorporation for that purpose, let us see that he has the necessary corporate powers. I am very much inclined to think that the bill does not give him any corporate power whatsoever, except to sue and be sued.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, does it not give corporate powers in this District?

Mr. THURMAN. Corporate powers to do what?

Mr. ANTHONY. To sue and to be sued.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes; it does that.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, give him that. [Laughter.]

Mr. THURMAN. Now, I hope my friend is not going to make a jest of genius and undertake to ridicule discovery. I am going to be very careful about it, because I have been charged by my friends here with being opposed to education and I do not know how many things in the last two days. I am going, therefore, for all measures that appertain to education and science, no matter what they are. I am going for this bill; but I want to make the bill perfect.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not mean to make a jest of it, although I believe, as in the case of nine-tenths or ninety-nine one-hundredths perhaps of all great discoveries, the chances are very much against its success. I believe it was Pope—if I am not right the Senator in the chair can correct me—who said:

"Great wit to madness nearly is allied."

I think there is as reasonable a chance of something coming out of this as there is in the case of most inventions. If this bill does not give him the corporate powers that the corporation ought to have, if the Senator from Ohio will indicate an amendment, I shall be very glad as a friend of the promoter of the enterprise to accept it.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator does not understand the point. If Congress were to pass an act, or any legislature were to pass an act, declaring A B, C D, and E F to be a body politic and corporate and were to confer upon them no corporate power except that to sue and be sued, they would have no other power, because an artificial body like a corporation has only such powers as are conferred upon it by its charter. The point that I suggest to my friend is whether there is any power to telegraph across the ocean or around the world by this bill. Is there any machinery for that purpose?

Mr. CARPENTER. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator from Ohio. The first section of the bill where it authorizes these persons to sue and to be sued also allows them to telegraph and to be telegraphed to.

Mr. THURMAN. Does it?

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a subsequent section which defines the object of the corporation, and there is a section which allows them to subscribe and enjoy certain capital.

Mr. THURMAN. Let us have that read, because that is as great a curiosity as the other.

Mr. ANTHONY. There is a section that allows them to have capital. I did not know but that there might be some objection to the large amount allowed as an increase of capital. I have no objection to having that stricken out.

Mr. THURMAN. No; I have not the least objection to that. Let that part about utilizing electricity be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That the business and objects of said corporation shall be to develop and utilize the principles and powers of natural electricity, to be used in telegraphing, generating light, heat, and motive power, and otherwise make and operate any machinery run by electricity for any purpose."

Mr. ANTHONY. There is an object.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. President, I am well satisfied that it is a safe rule to leave to the States everything that can be properly attended to by them, and as no power can be exercised under this charter except by permission of the States I think we have gone far enough, and this is a good time to stop. I object.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish to appeal to my friend from Nebraska——

Mr. TIPTON. No; I insist on the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill goes over under the objection of the Senator from Nebraska.

* * * * * * *

LOOMIS AERIAL TELEGRAPH.

Mr. ANTHONY. Now, let us go back to the Loomis aerial telegraph bill, the objection to which the Senator from Nebraska has withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, the Senate will consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill (H. R. 772) to incorporate the Loomis Aerial Telegraph Co.

Mr. MORRILL of Vermont. I think this bill is so interesting in its character that the Senate will desire very much to hear it read.

Mr. ANTHONY. It was read yesterday.

Mr. MORRILL of Vermont. I ask that it be read now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. MORRILL of Vermont. I ask the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, which reported this bill, to explain something of its character. I see it is entitled an aerial telegraph company, and yet the third section asserts that the chief business and occupation of the corporation shall be to utilize the principles and powers of natural electricity, to be used in telegraphing, generating light, heat, and motive power, and otherwise make and operate any machinery run by electricity for any purpose. I desire to know whether the chairman of the Committee on Commerce has thoroughly studied this subject, so that he has confidence in the results, and whether it is a fit subject for Congress to embark in. I have no doubt he will be able to give us a flood of light on this subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I am not specially familiar with the subject. My honorable friend the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] gave me a great deal of information about it, and I think he is perhaps better advised as to the scientific methods of performing the several acts proposed than anyone else here. I understand that you only have to get up fourteen or fifteen thousand feet above the earth when you can commence telegraphing if you have the instruments; but the precise methods of getting up I have never arrived at. I think my friend from Rhode Island will be able to give the information.

Mr. ANTHONY. This is not a proposition for the Government to embark in anything. It is simply to give an act of incorporation to a scientific man who thinks he has made a great invention; I do not know that he has. If there is anything in the bill itself that is improper, I should like to have it corrected; but if we are to refuse to incorporate a company because we believe they can not accomplish the object they undertake, I think we are embarking into all sorts of business. Yesterday it was complained by the Senator from Ohio that there was nothing for this corporation to do. Now, the Senator from Vermont says there is too much for them to do; they are to generate heat, light, electricity, and run machinery. I think that is considerable for one company.

I do not see anything objectionable in the bill. It is merely to incorporate a few men to do what any one of them can do alone, and if there is nothing objectionable in the bill I hope it will be allowed to pass.

It is very common to laugh down great inventions, or what their originators think are great inventions, and I dare say I join in it myself sometimes; but all great inventions have been illusions to begin with. The most charming of all American poets has said:

"But sneer not thou at those who rise to loftier illusions.
Great truths are oft, the Sage replies, foreshadowed by delusions."

Dr. Loomis thinks he can telegraph without intervention of wires, and he thinks he has made experiments which prove it, and if he can get persons to contribute money to test the question, where is the harm in giving him the opportunity to do it? He asks nothing from the Government.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, a very singular incident once occurred in the Senate of the United States that has often been mentioned as illustrative of, I was going to say, the impudence—but perhaps that is not the proper word—of one of the most distinguished Members this body has ever contained, the Senator from Kentucky, Mr. Clay. He made a speech in which he assailed the Democratic leaders, as he called them, in the Senate, and all the time he spoke he looked at the then Senator from Pennsylvania, who had a certain squint in his eye. That Senator rose to reply to him. After the Senator had stated the fact that he was replying, and was evidently taking the remarks to himself, Mr. Clay rose and said that the Senator was entirely mistaken, that he spoke of "the leaders of the party." The Senator from Pennsylvania was deeply abashed at that remark, and he said, "Why, the Senator looked at me." "There again," said Mr. Clay, "the Senator is entirely mistaken. That was entirely owing to the obliquity of his vision." [Laughter.]

Now, when the Senator from Rhode Island said there was an attempt to laugh this bill out of existence and ridicule it, he looked at me, if I have no obliquity of vision that misled me. I assure him that I am not attempting to laugh his bill out of existence; but if we are to treat it seriously I must say that it does not stand upon any such foundation as any other bill of this kind ever has that has come before the Senate.

The Senator alluded to Morse's invention yesterday. Why, sir, Morse demonstrated in this very Capitol Building, or in the old building, before the eyes of every Senator and Representative who saw fit to look at him, that his invention was a useful invention, that there was nothing imaginary about it. With his wires laid in this very Capitol and with his machinery in operation in the Rotunda of the Capitol, before the eyes of every Senator and Representative in Congress he demonstrated that his was not a visionary scheme; and then Congress did what? Then Congress gave him a small appropriation to try whether it would operate between here and the city of Baltimore; but before that little appropriation of $30,000 was made he had demonstrated with his instruments and with his wires in this very building in which we stand that it was not an imaginary thing at all, but that it was capable of doing what he claimed it would do.

I do not think that there has been any such demonstration by Mr. Loomis. Mr. Loomis, as I understand, claims that he can telegraph through the air without any wire or cable or anything at all; that just as the earth serves for a conductor with the telegraphic apparatus that we have, so far as the return of electricity is concerned in one direction, so he can dispense with the other wire and make the atmosphere do what the earth does now. That is his claim; but has he demonstrated it? Has he ever in any instance telegraphed a hundred yards, much less a hundred miles? Not so far as I know; not so far as is shown to us. Still I say I am not going to oppose this bill, although I do think it is a very singular thing for Congress to pass such a bill without one single experiment, so far as we know, ever having been successful in this novel mode of telegraphing.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator will allow me, when Mr. Morse demonstrated the feasibility of the electric telegraph we gave him an appropriation. This man does not ask for any appropriation. He asks for facilities to allow other people to test; that is all. I grant freely that it would be very improper, and I would not myself vote for an appropriation to this man for this purpose, but he only asks us to give him such facilities as will enable other people to contribute their money to see if anything can come out of his invention.

Mr. THURMAN. Is that all we propose to do? The Congress of the United States are asked to grant a solemn charter which really I can not understand, for it does not provide that he shall set up any telegraph anywhere, or maintain any telegraph line anywhere, and gives him no authority to establish telegraph lines anywhere; but we are asked to pass this charter—for what purpose?

Mr. ANTHONY. To test the experiment; nothing more.

Mr. THURMAN. To test the experiment. Well, I do not know that a charter is necessary in order to enable him to do that; but, as I said yesterday, I am not going to oppose the bill. I shall not vote against it, but I can not vote for it; and I really do fear it would be making Congress a little bit ridiculous to grant a solemn charter providing for $2,000,000 of capital to test an experiment which, if it is feasible, ought to have been tested long ago.

Mr. CAMERON. I think this bill has already interrupted the regular business too long, and I therefore object to its consideration unless we can get a vote at once upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senator is too late in making his objection to the bill.

Mr. CAMERON. I think not. I have very good authority for believing not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to postpone would be in order.

Mr. CAMERON. I do not wish to make that motion.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not want the Senator from Pennsylvania to object, and I hope he will not; but I am bound to say that according to the manner in which this rule has been administered an objection made at any time during the progress of a bill is in order. I made one myself the other day after a debate had been going on for two hours on a bill. I hope the Senator will not object, however, but will let us take a vote upon it.

Mr. CAMERON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ANTHONY. Still, if the Senator objects he has a right to do so, and it is in order.

Mr. CAMERON. I shall not insist on the objection if we can have a vote; but if there is to be further discussion I shall object.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. TIPTON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 12; as follows:

Yeas.—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Boreman, Buckingham, Cameron, Chandler, Cole, Corbett, Davis, Edmunds, Fenton, Ferry of Michigan, Flanagan, Gilbert, Harlan, Hitchcock, Kelly, Machen, Morton, Pratt, Ramsey, Ransom, Sawyer, Sherman, Stevenson, Stewart, Vickers, West, and Wilson—29.

Nays.—Messrs. Ames, Casserly, Ferry of Connecticut, Hamilton of Texas, Hamlin, Howe, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Robertson, Saulsbury, Tipton, and Trumbull—12.

Absent.—Messrs. Bayard, Blair, Brownlow, Caldwell, Carpenter, Clayton, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hamilton of Maryland, Hill, Johnston, Kellogg, Lewis, Logan, Norwood, Nye, Osborn, Patterson, Pomeroy, Pool, Rice, Schurz, Scott, Spencer, Sprague, Stockton, Sumner, Thurman, Windom, and Wright—33.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. McKELLAR. This section of the bill provides for an experiment upon a vital thing to the people of this country, to wit, transportation facilities around the cities. There is not a more vital internal proposition before the American people today than transportation, and especially the transportation from producer to consumer. A comparatively small appropriation is made in this bill to try out this method of transportation.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will in just a moment. I believe it is going to work for good. I believe the experiment will be a success. I believe it is a progressive step. I believe this kind of transportation will help solve the problems that are now before us on the subject of transportation. Surely there can not be any large loss, and I see no reason why the amendment should not be adopted. I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. In my own time I will take the floor.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall not pursue the matter further. I rose for the purpose of first defending the proposition of the committee and in the second place to call the attention of the Senate to the progressive feature of this provision of the bill. The provision is in the right direction. It is a matter that we ought to experiment about and that we ought to know about. We ought to know whether it is a feasible and economical method of transporting goods directly from the producer to the consumer, and after a careful trial if it is found economical we ought to adopt it. I believe the time will come when it will be in general use along the lines the Senator from Utah has argued that it could be used, if at all. I hope the Senate will adopt this provision.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a few minutes ago I suggested the showing the Postmaster General had made was fallacious, inasmuch as he did not differentiate between the income derived from the transportation of mails and the transportation of farm products. For instance, if the mail had not been transported in these trucks it would have been transported either by rural delivery carriers or star route, without any added expense to the Government.

I move to amend the amendment after the word "date," in line 9, page 30, to add the following words, where it is provided that the Postmaster General shall make a report to Congress:

Separately stating the income derived from the transportation of mail and the transportation of farm products.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not see any particular objection to that amendment. I think it is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. After the amendment that has just been adopted I move to insert a proviso as follows:

Provided, That in establishing the routes the Postmaster General shall distribute the routes equitably among the several States.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is all right. The committee has no objection to that, as far as I am concerned.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] says that this is an experiment; that if it proves to be unprofitable to the Government, doubtless it will be abandoned. Obviously it is bound to be profitable. According to the plans which have been proposed to establish these truck routes between the cities indicated, as I said a moment ago, it can not result other than in a profit. The jitney bus is profitable between given points within the thickly congested parts of the city, but when it continues its operations into the rural districts it is unprofitable. There is no necessity of an experiment. The figures submitted by the Postmaster General indicate that between here and Baltimore and between Philadelphia and New York there is a profit.

So if it is an experiment, as I said a moment ago, there is no necessity of making a further appropriation. Obviously if we are to experiment in an extensive way in the rural districts, $100,000 is inadequate. We know that to carry freight between rural districts and to convey the farm products of all the farmers to the point of consumption at rates anywhere reasonable there must be a loss. The appropriation is insufficient for rural experiments and to meet losses, and as it is unnecessary to experiment between points when it is seen to prove profitable, then it would seem to me, Mr. President, that there is no necessity of making this appropriation.

I do not agree with the deduction drawn by the Senator from Tennessee with respect to my opposition the other day to the provision of the bill relating to carrying the mail by aeroplanes. I was not opposed at the proper time to the utilization of aircraft for all legitimate purposes. I did oppose, and I oppose now, the appropriation of a single dollar for the building of aircraft to carry mail in the United States while the war is on. While we do not have an adequate supply of aircraft for our soldiers to fight with across the sea, I think it is an absurd Utopian scheme to talk now about establishing mail routes across the continent or between here and New York and carrying mail by airplanes.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. Let me complete the thought I have in my mind. I noticed in a number of papers that already the routes have been surveyed across the continent and stations located, if not established, at various points between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts. Who has authorized the establishment of routes and stations from the Atlantic to the Pacific and from the Gulf to the Canadian border? Where is the appropriation for such purpose?

Mr. HARDWICK. The last appropriation bill carried an appropriation of $100,000.

Mr. KING. For what?

Mr. HARDWICK. For airplane mail service.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The same as in this bill.

Mr. KING. I did not make myself clear. I understand that there was an appropriation of $100,000 heretofore made for airplane service, but the question that I intended to ask—probably it was my infirmity in expressing myself—was, Who authorized the Post Office Department or anybody else to establish stations from the Atlantic to the Pacific for airplane routes and stations for airplanes?

Mr. HARDWICK. That was exactly the object of the appropriation of $100,000, to do whatever they could within the limits of that amount to establish an airplane system.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator say the $100,000 was for the purpose of acquiring fields and stations and for establishing routes across the continent?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think that could be deduced as one of the purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I did not so understand the other day, from the statement made by Senators who discussed this bill, that the appropriation was for that purpose. I understood that the appropriation of $100,000 was for the purchase of machines and for experimental work between here and New York or, as one of the Senators said, in Alaska.

Mr. HARDWICK. Some experiment was made in Alaska and some here; but there was no such limit as that expressed in the law. It was merely for aeroplane service anywhere in the United States. Of course, I think that would include the preparation of stations and the laying out of routes. The language was broad enough to do that.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator understands that the kind of aeroplanes to be used in this service are wholly different from anything that can possibly be used in the battle front?

Mr. KING. I think the perfection of aircraft in this country has not reached that point where it would be wise or prudent to embark upon the policy of carrying mail by means of aircraft.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does it occur to the Senator that possibly when we get around to the appropriation bill next year we will provide for carrying garden truck by aeroplane or motor truck?

Mr. KING. I am not sure what will be recommended by the officials of the Government. When some persons get into office and get a bureau established they want to aggrandize that bureau and make it so potential for good, but it is often for evil, that the most extravagant, absurd, of Utopian schemes are proposed and Congress is asked to ratify the propositions and make great appropriations to carry them into effect.

Mr. MCKELLAR. If the Senator will yield to me to reply to the Senator from New Hampshire——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I do not think if the question was answered in the affirmative it would be any more unusual or remarkable than the result has been in regard to wireless telegraphy, about which various Senators in this body laughed very heartily in 1873. They laughed about that in the same way they are now laughing about the use of the aeroplane service of this date.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, the same sort of laughter was used when we established the Rural Delivery System.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Precisely the same, and in every progressive service the Government has established.

Mr. GALLINGER. Assuming that to be true, then no proposition that is labeled "progress" should be opposed in this body.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Oh, no.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree with the Senator from Tennessee that it is possible to convey garden truck by aeroplane. I am not fearing the possibility of ever doing that, but I merely suggested if these motor trucks should not succeed as well as hoped for, probably the next experiment would be that it should be increased on the ground of progress, and they will try the aeroplane. But I agree with the Senator from Utah we had better take care of our soldiers, so far as that is concerned, before we go to carrying mail between here and New York by aeroplane.

Mr. KING. I do not want my good friend from Tennessee to put me in a false light, and I know he would not intentionally.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Of course I would not.

Mr. KING. I do not oppose the proposition that at the appropriate time experiments shall be made with aircraft for use in carrying the mail. What I objected to the other day, and when the question shall come up for consideration again I shall object to it then as strenuously as I did last week, was to the making of an appropriation now for experimental purposes in carrying mails by aircraft. This morning's paper chronicles the fact that the Bristol plane that we had expected so much of is perhaps a failure. With all the appropriations we have made, and with the demands which are so imperative for aircraft to fight across the sea, we have been unable to supply the troops we have sent to Europe.

I am not now placing the blame upon anybody. I merely state that we understood that by this time our country was to have constructed thousands of fighting planes for use upon the battle fields where our soldiers and our allies are so bravely fighting for liberty and for the life of free peoples. We have, however, built but a few.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We have not shipped any that have arrived there.

Mr. KING. The distinguished Senator from Georgia, a member now of the Military Affairs Committee, says we have not shipped any that have arrived there.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I refer to fighting planes. We have shipped one or two, but we have no report that either of those two fighting planes has yet reached France.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, we are now engaged in fighting the greatest war of all time. It is a struggle between democracy and the cruelest and most brutal nation developed in modern times. We are fighting for our Nation's life and for the liberties of many peoples This war requires all of our attention. We need billions of dollars for the prosecution of the war. We may have difficulty in raising the amount of money to meet the stupendous and staggering appropriations that will be demanded for the current year. I do not mean that there will be a lack of patriotism or any unwillingness to make sacrifices by the people. But the demands for the war will be so enormous it will tax the resources of the people. The savings of the people are limited, and only from them will the money come for taxes and for loans.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Utah doubtless has observed that while $980,000,000 have already been appropriated for airplanes, the modest sum of $1,000,000,000 in addition is now asked for by the department.

Mr. KING. I recall what the Senator from New Hampshire states to be the fact. Mr. President, we know that we shall have to increase the taxes, for the fiscal year of 1919, 50 per cent, at least, in excess of what they were for the fiscal year 1918. We will be compelled to cut to the bone in order to raise six or seven billion dollars by taxation. That will perhaps not be more than 33 per cent of the amount that will be required to meet the expenditures for the year 1919. It requires, therefore, utmost economy. Every dollar which we appropriate should be scrutinized and not one cent should be appropriated for any purpose that is not imperatively demanded. I know that a hundred thousand dollars here and a million dollars there, or a few millions, seem to be inconsequential measured by the great torrent of appropriations demanded and the great floods of appropriations which are made; but when we go into the realm of experimentation now, no matter how useful the purpose may be, how utilitarian the scheme may be, it is unwise. Let us conserve our resources; conserve our energies, not diffuse our power and diffuse our energies; let us concentrate everything to the one end of winning this war, to beating down Prussian militarism. Cato of old closed every speech by saying, "Delenda est Carthago." Our every thought now must be, "Prussian autocracy must be destroyed," and every plan desired must look to the defeat of our deadly foe.

Every dollar will be required to carry on this war and to meet the heavy exactions that are made upon this Government. I am not opposed at the proper time to appropriating for the purpose of experimenting with aircraft as an instrumentality for the carrying of mails, but the experiences we have had to date in building aircraft have been so tragic and disappointing, it seems to me that the plan of using airplanes for the carrying of the mails at the present time is improper and absurd.

With the developments that will flow from the war, with the individual inventions that are being made, when the war is over we shall know something about aircraft and be in a position to utilize them in many ways. Let us spend our money, devote sufficient of our resources and our inventive genius, in devising aircraft for fighting purposes instead of following some chimerical scheme that needs time and improvement to make it of value.

But, to come back to the question before the Senate now for consideration, Mr. President, of course it is important to get the products of the farm to the ultimate consumer. It is important to have the cotton planter get his cotton to market as cheaply as possible, and for the woolgrower to have his wool brought to market with as little expense as possible. The farmer who grows wheat and produces other agricultural crops is interested in having his agricultural products carried to the centers of consumption with as little cost as possible. What does that argue? It would seem that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] draws the conclusion that the Government must embark upon the business of carrying the products of the farm and the field, of the mine and the smelter, and of the mill, to the ultimate consumer.

I grant that the Government, with an overflowing Treasury, with its tremendous powers, can engage in the business of building and operating railroads, interurban or otherwise, steamship lines, motor trucks, and all other instrumentalities for transportation, and can perform the duties of a common carrier; but does that mean that in the long run it will be beneficial to the people? Does that argue that the Government will do it cheaper than individuals will? It argues, of course, that if the Government does it, it drives individuals out of the market; if the Government engages in railroading, private individuals will not; if the Government engages in carrying the products of the farm and the mill and the mine from the producer to the consumer, individuals will not. Everybody knows that whatever the Government undertakes it costs more than if private individuals performed the same work. It has been conceded that the statement of the former distinguished Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Aldrich, now deceased, was correct when he remarked that the work of the Government, if it were in the hands of private individuals, could be done annually for $300,000,000 less than what it was costing the Government. It is recognized that when the Government undertakes the prosecution of work the expense of doing it is enormous; that it is greatly in excess of the cost of the same work if it were done by private individuals.

Take it in the prosecution of the war. Whatever the Government touches, as if by magic the prices rise and the cost to the Government of constructing anything is infinitely greater than if it were constructed by private individuals. We shall find that the Government in the operation of railroads, as was said by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], will lose money; that is to say, it will cost more to the people, and there will not be corresponding benefits. Already we are reading in the newspapers that the loss to the Government is very great; that it was over fifty millions of dollars last month, and there will be millions of loss this month, notwithstanding the economies that have been put into operation by the Director General of the Railroads.

I concede that it is something to be desired by the producer to have some agency come to his door and carry to market all of his surplus products; it may result temporarily in benefit to the producer and to the consumer, but in the long run, when the system is put into operation, when it becomes coextensive with the territorial boundaries of the Nation, it will be found that the cost of operating this system is infinitely greater than the cost would be if the transportation instrumentalities were left in the hands of private individuals. Europe has demonstrated that.

It is easy to make an appeal now, when we are at war, for governmental control of all things, and an appeal will not fall upon deaf ears; it is as a siren voice sounding sweet to the ear to say, "Why not have the Government solve this question of transportation by going out to the farmers, gathering up the farmers' products, and carrying them into the cities, where they can be consumed by the people?"

But those who so speak do not present to us the other side of the picture. They do not tell of governmental inefficiency, of the increased cost which the taxpayer must pay, of the evils of bureaucracy, of increased officeholders, so that in the end we will have but two classes—those who hold office and those who toil for them.

They do not tell us of the perils that will result to our Government, of the evils flowing from a consolidation of all powers in the Federal Government, of the condition that will follow the loss by the States of their prerogatives, and the incalculable harm that must follow the destruction of the spirit of independence and self-effort flowing from a tyrannous paternalism or an oppressive socialism. If we establish lines between Washington and Baltimore, then we must establish them everywhere in this broad land. We can not discriminate. When we let the camel put its nose inside the building, the entire body will be forced into the room. If the Government enters upon the plan of transporting the people's products, soon there will be no private transportation companies, no private enterprises devoted to this important business. Little by little the Government will crowd out private enterprise and assume the functions of the States and the duties of the citizens. When this is accomplished there will be no Republic, our Government will have been destroyed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, during the remarks of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I interrupted him; and, in order that there may be no inaccuracy in the statement, I wish to say that during last month one fighting airplane started to France. Within the past few days several others have started. Up to the latter part of last week no report had been received of the arrival of the first fighting airplane. I do not mean by that statement to question the fact that a number of practice planes and observation planes have been sent from the United States abroad. I wish thus clearly to differentiate between the fighting planes, the observation planes, and the practice planes.

Mr. President, under the circumstances I feel that all of the energy of the United States with reference to flying machines ought to be devoted to supplying machines for use on the battle field. I feel that it would be a mistake to adopt section 8. If we were not at war, and our Government desired to experiment with some flying machines for the purpose of transporting mail, I would not object; but now I do not think that any attention should be given to flying machines for mail carriage, but that every energy in the direction of the construction of flying machines should be devoted to preparations for war.

What I wished to refer to really was section 7. I was on the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads when the parcel post was adopted, and I know we all hoped then, and believed then, that the adoption of the parcel post would bring the rural sections and the cities of this country closer together; that it would furnish better markets to the farmers and better food supplies to the people in the cities. I can see no possible objection to this provision.

I understand the argument made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], that if the camel's nose got inside the tent, soon the body would be there. That argument was presented to us as an objection to any kind of parcel-post legislation. I believe in the parcel post. Mr. President, in the cities of our land we find a dense population, especially at this time. We find it very difficult to obtain readily and at fair prices small products that grow upon the farms within 25 and 50 miles of our great cities and within 25 miles of our smaller cities.

The Senator from Utah says that this should be left to private undertaking. We have been leaving it there for a century, and private enterprise has not met the demand. Instead of unified private organization to carry the products of the many farmers to our cities, each man, with his little peddling wagon, comes in at great loss, with slow time, and with unsystematic delivery, with waste to the farmer and unnecessary consumption of the money of the man who is to use his supplies. There has never been an organized effort to handle this question, and this proposition is that a small amount of money be used by the Post Office Department to begin a system of delivery of those things so essential to the health of the people in the cities, so essential to the humble and poorer classes. I believe that by this system the Government can bring within the reach of the poorer classes in the cities vast quantities of most healthful food at prices cheaper than bread; I believe it can relieve the demand for bread and flour; I believe it can help us substantially in meeting the demand for food supplies required during the war. It will stimulate the small farmer and add to his profits; it will supply the consumer in the city and lessen his cost.

Mr. VARDAMAN. And give him fresh, pure food.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And, as the Senator from Mississippi says, guarantee to him fresh and wholesome food. I cordially commend section 7 and shall vote for it with a great deal of pleasure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment incorporated by the committee as section 7.

Mr. VARDAMAN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK]. He requested me to observe the pair during his absence. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. As he is not present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent for the day. I am paired with him for the day. I understand if he were present that he would vote as I intend to vote on this amendment, and therefore I feel at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask to return to the provision at the top of page 17, commencing in line 1 and going down to and including line 14. This is the provision on airplane mail service, and I wish to dispose of it.

Mr. President, when we had this provision of the bill under consideration some days ago it was suggested that we pass it over with a view of getting some information from the Post Office Department. I wrote to the department and asked for the information which it appeared the Senate wanted and which I think they were entitled to have. I have a letter——

Mr. THOMAS. Before the Senator refers to the letter, may I ask him whether we did not pass a bill a few days ago relating to this identical subject—a bill offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not remember as to that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. We passed a bill authorizing a charge of 24 cents an ounce for mail carried by airplanes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We passed that; but that is not the same as this provision.

Mr. THOMAS. It is supplemental to it, I apprehend.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I am going to ask the Secretary to read the letter to which I have referred; and when it has been read, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote. The letter contains all the information, I presume, that can be had on the subject. I am entirely willing that the Senate should decide whether or not they want this provision to remain in the bill. I ask the Secretary to read the letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will first state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. The amendment of the committee is, on page 17, line 11, after the word "determine," to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That the Postmaster General, in his discretion, may fix the amount of postage on mail carried by aeroplane at not exceeding 24 cents an ounce or fraction thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the letter as requested.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 9, 1918.

Hon. JOHN BANKHEAD,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BANKHEAD: The item in the Post Office appropriation bill authorizing the expenditure out of the appropriation for "inland transportation by steamboats or other power boats or by aeroplanes" of the sum of $100,000 for the purchase, operation, and maintenance of aeroplanes for an experimental aeroplane mail service seeks to repeat the authorization carried in the appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918. Practically all of this appropriation has been expended, a part in the purchase of aeroplanes, spare parts, and hangars, and putting in condition landing fields for the aerial mail service.

In 1916 the Post Office Department was informed that an aeroplane passenger and express service would be established in Alaska, and inquiry was made whether arrangements could be perfected for carrying the mail by aeroplane in that territory. Accordingly, bids were invited for aerial mail transportation in Alaska, but no results were obtained. The parties who had expected to introduce this service in Alaska assigned for the reason that the aeroplanes at that time were not sufficiently high powered, nor reliable enough, to cope with the weather conditions in that territory.

The appropriation of $100,000 available during the current fiscal year enabled the Post Office Department to enter upon the work of inaugurating its present aerial mail program. This is the first money expended by the Post Office Department for aeroplane service, it being the first appropriation by Congress. Heretofore Congress had not appropriated money, but had permitted aeroplane service by contract under the appropriation for inland transportation by steamboats or other power boats or aeroplanes. The experiments in carrying mail by aeroplane in the past have been purely voluntary by fliers and have not cost the Government any money. The results, however, are not satisfactory, as they give no indication of the ability to maintain a daily service.

Construction of aeroplanes, and specially of aeroplane motors, has reached such development as to make it reasonably certain that a daily dependable aerial mail service can be maintained. The department is advised that Italy has already established such a service, which is so successful that it is being rapidly extended in that country. In developing its aerial mail program, the Post Office Department conferred with the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, with the Aircraft Board, and with the War Department. All of these Government agencies approved the proposal of the Post Office Department to enter upon the operation of its aerial mail service at this time, and the release to manufacturers of the necessary equipment for the service was given, as the problems which the operation of a daily aerial mail service will help to solve, and the cross-country training it will give to aviators is regarded as being distinctly helpful to the Government air-service program.

On March 21, 1918, the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics addressed the following letter to the Secretary of War on the subject of the aerial mail service:

"NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS,
"Washington, D. C., March 21, 1918.

"The honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR,
"Washington, D. C.

"DEAR SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of a resolution adopted by the executive committee of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics on March 15, 1918, recommending cooperation between the Aviation Service of the Signal Corps and the Post Office Department in the experimental development of an aerial mail service between Washington, Philadelphia, and New York. Congress authorized the Post Office Department to establish such an experimental service and made an appropriation of $100,000 for the purpose.

"Under existing conditions practically all aircraft manufacturing facilities are being utilized by the War and Navy Departments, and all capable aviators are in the service of these departments. In view of the further fact that it is exceedingly desirable that Army aviators be regularly and systematically trained in long-distance flying, it would appear to be to the advantage of the Government and of the War Department that military airplanes and aviators be used to render practical and effective service to the Nation in the manner proposed. It was with this in view, and after careful consideration, that the committee passed the following resolution:

"'Resolved, That the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics recommends to the Secretary of War that, if practicable, active cooperation be established between the Aviation Service of the Signal Corps and the Post Office Department in connection with the proposed experimental aerial mail service between Washington, Philadelphia, and New York.'

"Respectfully,
"CHARLES D. WALCOTT,
"Chairman Executive Committee."

So well did the Post Office project appear to lend itself to war training plans that the Signal Corps offered to weave the Aerial Postal Service into its training work and furnish the planes, mechanics, and fliers for the route between Washington and New York. In a memorandum dated March 1, from the Chief Signal Officer to all divisions of the Signal Corps, it is announced: "The Signal Corps is interested in this project (operating aerial mail service), because of the experience it will give pilots in cross-country flying and will give an opportunity to make endurance tests in actual service."

The service between New York and Boston will be operated with aeroplanes purchased and maintained by the Post Office Department for that purpose out of the appropriation for the current fiscal year. Six machines and duplicate parts were purchased as the result of advertisements inviting competitive bids. Those purchased, together with the acquirement of hangars and the preparation of landing fields, and other equipment in connection with the Aerial Mail Service and its operation until June 30, 1918, will consume approximately the entire appropriation.

A great advancement in the mails will result from the route between New York and Washington. Besides accomplishing the delivery of letters on every carrier delivery in New York City and by immediate-delivery service in Washington on the same afternoon that the letter is mailed from either terminus or from Philadelphia, connections are made at New York for the larger cities in Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey; at Washington for Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, St. Louis, and intermediate points; and Charlotte (N. C.), Atlanta, and Birmingham, and intermediate points. Important connections are also made at Philadelphia. In order to have made these connections by railroad it would have been necessary to have had a letter in the post office in time to leave on the 8 o'clock morning trains.

The aeroplanes to operate the Washington, Philadelphia, and New York route I am advised have been set up by the Signal Corps at Mineola, N. Y., and that branch of the War Department will be ready to operate this route on May 15.

Sincerely, yours,
A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I believe the question before the Senate now is the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to strike out, beginning with line 7, down to and including line 14. I should like to have the Secretary read the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17 it is proposed to strike out all of lines 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 and to disagree to the proposed amendment of the committee. Lines 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 read:

That out of this appropriation the Postmaster General is authorized to expend not exceeding $100,000 for the purchase, operation, and maintenance of aeroplanes for an experimental aeroplane mail service between such points as he may determine.

And the committee proposed amendment follows:

Provided further, That the Postmaster General, in his discretion, may fix the amount of postage on mail carried by aeroplane at not exceeding 24 cents an ounce or fraction thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that there is no objection to the amendment if the provision is to stay in. The Senate has already passed a bill like it. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. Now, the Senator from Utah——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no, Mr. President. Does the Chair mean the amendment of the Senator from Utah?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair means the committee amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, yes. There is no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now, the Senator from Utah proposes to strike out the whole thing.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Secretary to the fact that the motion of the Senator from Utah includes two words on line 5: "Provided further." They ought to come out. So far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, as I remember, the Senator's motion also includes the words "or by airplanes" in line 2.

Mr. KING. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. HARDWICK. Before the vote is taken—I think the matter has been discussed sufficiently—there is at the desk a telegram from the Aero Club of America on this subject, and I think it might as well be read.

Mr. WEEKS. It has been read.

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, no; not that telegram. It is the concluding telegram, at the end of the communication of the Postmaster General. His letter contains some resolutions adopted by the National Defense Committee on Aeronautics. This is another proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, May 8, 1918.

Mr. W. H. L. HOWARD,
Secretary National Aerial Coast Patrol Commission,
Washington, D. C.:

Necessity great of having the appropriation for mail carrying by aeroplanes increased to $500,000. Present appropriation is not large enough to pay cost of running mail line for one year and establish two additional lines to give advance cross-country flying training to military aviators who will pilot the postal aeroplanes. It is absolutely necessary that this cross-country flying training be given to our aviators before sending them overseas, and while getting this training their services can be utilized to carry mail. Had we done this in the past two years we would have had several hundred fully trained aviators to send to France upon our entry in the war, which would have given a sufficient balance of power to insure aerial supremacy to the allies. The least that we can do now at this critical time is not to make this same mistake again. The machines to be used for carrying mail will afford training to military pilots which, so far, they have not gotten in any other way. France Italy, and England use aeroplanes for mail carrying to hasten delivery of military correspondence.

Cordially,

ALAN R. HAWLEY,
President Aero Club of America.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I doubt very much whether the President of the Aero Club of America has had his attention called to section 8 of this bill. If he had I hardly think he would have thought it necessary to ask for the $500,000.

I want to call the attention of the Senate to section 8 in connection with the matter now before the Senate:

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, deliver and turn over to the Postmaster General from time to time, and without charge therefor, for use in the Postal Service, such aeroplanes and automobiles or parts thereof as may prove to be, or as shall become, unsuitable for the purposes of the War Department.

In other words, Mr. President, it seems from this section that whenever any part of an aeroplane becomes obsolete and the War Department can not use it, or any airplane breaks down and proves unfit for the use of the War Department, it is to be turned over to the Post Office Department.

Mr. GALLINGER. In other words, if the Senator will permit me, they can unload their junk on the Post Office Department.

Mr. SMOOT. The employees of the Post Office Department who may be assigned to carry mail by aeroplane must carry it in aeroplanes or automobiles that have been discarded by the War Department, and they can take their chances as to whether they can get to their destination or not.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him——

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, the Senator has noticed that the expression is "unsuitable for the purposes of the War Department."

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. That does not necessarily mean that the airplanes and automobiles to be turned over are junk. The planes suitable for war purposes are changing every week or so and giving way to some improvement for that purpose. For example, within the last six months, I think, the little Nieuport fighter was a machine which appeared to be the last thing in fighting airplanes. It is now obsolete. That occurs with reference to other types; and I think the purpose of this section is to make machines perfectly suitable for the transportation of the mail, but unsuitable for war purposes, subject to the disposition of the Post Office Department.

Mr. SMOOT. The little fighting machine of which the Senator speaks will never be suitable for carrying the mail.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator misunderstands me. I mentioned that merely by way of illustration. Of course, it is good for nothing for that purpose; but there are other planes that would be serviceable for the purpose, suitable perhaps to-day for war purposes, which three months from now would be obsolete for war purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think that whenever the War Department turns them over they will be obsolete for almost every purpose; or, in other words, there will have been improvements made upon the airplanes such as will justify the scrapping of all that they undertake to turn over to the Post Office Department. That is all that I can see that will come from section 8. I simply call attention to it now, not with an idea of having the Senate pass upon the amendment that is before the Senate with that in view, but in answer to the telegram from the president of the Aero Club of America that was read here from the desk.

Mr. President, I do not think there are any Senators who would object to carrying mail by aeroplanes if they thought it would be of advantage to our country, or that the time had arrived when the airplane had reach such a period of perfection that the service could be rendered successfully and approaching the cost to the Government; but at a time when we are straining every nerve possible to secure airplanes for the use of our Army in France, and every one of them that is produced may mean the preservation of the lives of hundreds of our soldiers, it does seem to me that we could at least forego this experiment for another year. That is the only reason why I call attention to this matter at this time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator excuse me a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the motion of the Senator from Utah prevails, and this appropriation is stricken out, section 8 may as well go out, too.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is true.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let us dispose of this, and then come to section 8.

Mr. SMOOT. So far as that is concerned, it seems to me that both sections are related. I wanted to call attention to the fact that if the Post Office Department is going into this business, the Post Office Department ought to have the very best planes that can be made in the world; and unless they do, not only is life jeopardized but the success of the project itself is jeopardized.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, let me suggest this to the Senator: The Senator from Utah moves to strike out, on line 2, the words "or by airplanes."

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, as the Senator has heard, we already have six of these machines, just recently manufactured for the department. Other legislation than this bill provides for this service between here and New York, via Philadelphia; and I am afraid that if all of the Senator's motion were to prevail we would be left with these airplanes on our hands, and without any money to operate them even if we are to build or to buy no further airplanes.

Mr. SMOOT. What appropriation was made authorizing the purchase of those six airplanes?

Mr. HARDWICK. The same appropriation, namely, $100,000, was carried in the last annual Post Office appropriation bill; and under that appropriation, as the Postmaster General explains, he bought these six airplanes. Now, if the entire motion of the Senator from Utah should prevail, he not only could not buy any more, or even take any more from the War Department when they did not think they could be used for military purposes, but we would cripple him so that he could not use what we have already bought and paid for.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. HARDWICK. So the motion certainly ought to be changed in that respect before we vote on it.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, the Senator thinks we ought to retain the words "or by airplanes," in line 2, page 17, even though the balance goes out?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think those words ought to be left in the bill, even though we do not pursue the project any further.

Mr. SMOOT. Although the balance of the amendment was agreed to?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think so; undoubtedly.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure that the Senator's statement is correct. If those words went out, there would be no provision for operating the six planes that have already been purchased.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes. If I have the floor, I yield.

Mr. KING. Where is the appropriation for the expense that will be necessarily incurred in operating the six planes which the Senator says are now constructed? I ask the question because it is clear, from what little I know of the operation of these machines, that the expense of maintaining and operating the six airplanes will be tremendous. It is stated that for every machine that is used upon the field some 15 or 20 mechanics of skill—great skill, let me say—are required to keep the plane in order.

Mr. HARDWICK. That would be true of a fighting plane, but not of these.

Mr. KING. I fancied that the expense of keeping these in order would be considerable.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me explain to the Senator what the situation would be if his motion should prevail as he makes it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Utah that he need not be disturbed about that. We will have some more deficiency bills before we get through with this session.

Mr. KING. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. SMOOT. Four or five of them.

Mr. HARDWICK. That would not make any difference.

Mr. GALLINGER. It can be provided for.

Mr. HARDWICK. Now, let us see exactly what the situation will be, Mr. President, if the Senator's motion prevails as he makes it. I do not believe he wants to insist on it in the form in which it now is.

The bill reads:

For inland transportation by steamboat or other power-boat routes or by aeroplanes, $1,185,000.

And then, at a later period, there is a limitation on the amount of that sum which may be used for transportation by airplanes, in the following language:

Provided further, That out of this appropriation the Postmaster General is authorized to expend not exceeding $100,000 for the purchase, operation, and maintenance of aeroplanes for an experimental aeroplane mail service between such points as he may determine.

My recollection is that the bill offered by the Senator from Texas passed this body; but I do not know whether it has passed the other body, too, or not.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; it has passed the House, Mr. President, and is now a law.

Mr. HARDWICK. It is now a law. We have already established this service by law, and the Postmaster General is authorized to operate between these places. Under an appropriation that we made a year ago we have spent practically $100,000 in purchasing and equipping six airplanes, with the full consent of the War Department and under circumstances which induced them to say that it not only did not interfere with their program, but was an affirmative aid to them in the execution of their program.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. KING. What do these words mean, in the light of the statement of the Senator—and, of course, he is familiar with this subject, and most of us are not:

Provided further, That out of this appropriation the Postmaster General is authorized to expend not exceeding $100,000 for the purchase, operation, and maintenance of aeroplanes for an experimental aeroplane mail service between such points as he may determine.

Does not that mean that $100,000 is to be devoted by him to further experimental purposes and to the purchase of additional planes?

Mr. HARDWICK. I think that is a limitation on the language first employed. My own judgment is—I am just giving the Senator my opinion now—that the language in section 2 would have authorized the Postmaster General to expend any portion of the $1,185,000 that he wanted to expend for airplane service if it had not been for the limitation contained in the proviso to which the Senator refers, but that the proviso is to be construed as a limitation on the language first employed, and that under that language he could not employ more than $100,000 of this sum for this particular purpose. My construction of the language is further borne out by the fact that that is the way the department itself has construed exactly similar language in the last Post Office appropriation bill.

Now, we have got to what I want to call the Senator's attention. Under legislation that we passed the other day, originating in this body, introduced by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], and concurred in by the other House, and now become a law, we have authorized this sort of service between New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington. I hope some Senator will correct me if I have not stated it right. I was not here when that bill was passed. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The bill to which the Senator refers authorized the fixing of postal rates for the service.

Mr. HARDWICK. Did it authorize the service itself?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It did not.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then that is not quite as bad as I thought; but the situation is bad enough. I mean by that, we would not be in quite as much difficulty as I thought we would if we go along here and pass other legislation refusing to give the Postmaster General power to establish and operate the service that we previously authorized in another bill, and that Congress authorized, and that has become the law. But under the appropriation we made a year ago the department has already purchased and equipped and is ready to operate six of these planes. Now, what are we to do with them? Of course, the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is one that we might take, but it seems to me that that is mere procrastination. If we are going to have the service at all, and are going to use these airplanes at all, there is no need to wait for a deficiency appropriation. Here is the place where the appropriation ought to be made, if we are going to provide for it at all; and if it is not made here I do not know that it ought to be made anywhere else, because this is the committee that deals with postal affairs, and the Senate now is engaged in disposing of postal affairs according to its views.

I do not think it is exactly sound to say that when we have spent $100,000 to purchase these six airplanes we are not going to operate them at all, and we are going to throw them away. I do not care what becomes of this appropriation, so far as I am concerned. I do not know a great deal about it. If I thought, as some Senators have expressed themselves, that there was the slightest danger that this appropriation could interfere in the smallest degree with getting airplanes for fighting purposes and sending them to the battle lines in France, I should say cut it out and run no risk. But when I am advised by the Post Office Department, by these various bodies that deal with the subject, including the National Defense Committee, and by the Secretary of War, in conference with the Postmaster General, that no conflict of that character is possible, and that there has been none; that the machines that are adapted to that purpose are not used at all for fighting purposes, and are not suitable for fighting purposes; when that showing is made I confess that I can not see very much in the argument.

My view of the question is still further strengthened when I realize that this aeronautical association, no matter how ambitious they are about amounts—I do not pay much attention to that; the Senator from Utah got some comfort out of what he thought was the extravagance of their demands, but I am not concurring with them on the amount—this aeronautical association seems to agree with the Post Office Department, and the Post Office Department seems to agree with the War Department and with the Navy Department, that by experimenting with these machines that they have and with the machines that are perfectly useless to the War Department, if you let section 8 stay in the bill they can give our fighting aviators and pilots actual and practicable cross-country training in flying before they go abroad.

Now, if that can be done, and we have the opinion not only of the Post Office Department but of the War Department and the Navy Department and the Council of National Defense, if it not only can be done but it is true, I do not see why we could not use the machines that are not fighting machines that are already built and which already belong to the Post Office Department for this service in this country without interfering in the smallest degree with the operations over there. Still it is a matter, I think, for the judgment of each Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. What does the Senator say to the suggestion made by the Aeronautical Society that $100,000 is wholly inadequate, that it must be increased to at least $500,000?

Mr. HARDWICK. I have just told the Senator I did not favor going into it to any such extent as that. I would rather stick by the amount recommended by the committee if we are going to do it at all by the Post Office Department. I want Senators to understand that it is held by the War Department and the Navy Department and all the balance of them, and if there was any conflict between the departments on this question I would unhesitatingly follow the ideas of the fighting department of our Government. But when the Post Office Department comes in and says that the War Department and the Navy Department are anxious for them to go ahead with this thing, and are detailing men for the practice the men will get in helping to put on these routes, I can not see why, whatever our preconceived opinion might be as to whether there might be some possibility of interference, we should not overcome that entirely; although, as I said, the committee merely followed the recommendation of the department and it is perfectly willing to accept whatever the judgment of the Senate is about it.

EDUCATION OF ILLITERATES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I had intended this afternoon to move to take up Senate bill 4185 to require the Commissioner of Education to devise methods and promote plans for the elimination of adult illiteracy in the United States. The bill provides for a small appropriation of $100,000 the first year, $50,000 the second year, and $50,000 the third, to go to the Bureau of Education to aid in certain very important work now going on. But my object in making the motion would have been to utilize the time of day when I would have the right to discuss it. There are so few Senators here this evening that it would be hardly worth while to present my views, and I shall not do so. I wish, however, even to those present, to say that this bill came to me from the Secretary of the Interior with an appeal for its passage because he needed it in the direction of certain important work he was doing. He has since sent me the action of the Council of National Defense expressing the desire for work in the cantonments and for work among the illiterates, and especially those who can not speak English who are in the draft age.

The Secretary of the Interior called a convention of governors here, and he has, with the aid of the Bureau of Education, mapped out a line of work in the various States seeking especially to overcome the lack of knowledge of English, that the men going into the cantonments may be taught at least to understand the orders they are given. I have quite a record showing a splendid plan of work that is contemplated. The great object of it is, first, to teach English to those who are to go into the cantonments and to teach some capacity to read to the 700,000 illiterates who are within the draft age.

I want to present this to the Senate the first opportunity I can get before 2 o'clock. I can only make a motion to take up the bill, but I can not argue the motion. I expect if I get the floor again to-morrow morning to make the motion. If the motion does not prevail after 2 o'clock I shall make the motion again until I know that Senators understand what is in the bill. If they understand what is in the bill and want to beat it, I can not help it. I am sorry that they do not appreciate it. I am sure that it is wise and desirable, and I am going to persist with the bill until I know that Senators understand what is in it and beat it, knowing what is in it or else adopt it.

I will not make the motion now.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask my colleague, Mr. KING, if he will not divide his motion first by striking out all after the word "Provided," in line 6, down to and including the word "thereof" in line 14, and then if that prevails take a vote on striking out the three words in line 2.

In explanation of my request, I desire to say that I am in favor of striking out after the word "Provided" the balance of that paragraph, but I believe that we ought to leave in the words "or by airplane" in the bill, seeing that we have six purchased already, and it will not take any further increased appropriation to allow them at least to experiment with the six airplanes that they already have purchased.

Mr. KING. In the light of the explanation which was made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] a moment ago, namely, that six airplanes have been constructed and, as I understood him, are ready for service, I intended to divide the motion, as suggested by my colleague, and I further intended to ask the Senator in charge of the bill to let this section go over until to-morrow. If certain information which was suggested by the Senator, when I have a chance to look up the matter a little further, is of the character I anticipate, I may supplement the motion by moving to transfer these machines to the War Department for service there.

I ask the Senator if he is willing that the vote upon this section may go over until to-morrow. I fancy there are other matters here that can be considered.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It must be borne in mind that this matter has been passed once.

Mr. KING. I appreciate that fact.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And we want to get along with the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. What is the Senator's purpose?

Mr. KING. I wish to make some further inquiry as to the six machines to which the Senator from Georgia referred.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask that it may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator want to have an executive session to-night?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I do not know of any necessity for an executive session.

Mr. SMOOT. It is now after 5 o'clock.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

THE CALENDAR—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to submit a written notice of an amendment to the rules.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If it leads to no debate, I will yield.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It will lead to no debate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It really ought to come in the morning hour when we will all know about it, but I shall not object.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is a written notice of an amendment of the rules that I shall offer to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Very well. I will not make a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The notice will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

I hereby give notice that it is my intention to introduce an amendment to paragraph 3, Rule VII, of the standing rules of the Senate.

The purpose of the amendment is to make certain the consideration of bills on the calendar, during the time between the expiration of morning business and the hour of 2 o'clock p. m., unless there should be unanamious consent for other action.

The proposed amendment is to substitute "2 o'clock" for "1 o'clock" in section 3, Rule VII, and to substitute the word "and" for the word "or," so that as amended the rule would read as follows:

"3. Until the morning business shall have been concluded and so announced from the chair, and until the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, no motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the calendar, shall be entertained by the Presiding Officer, unless by unanimous consent; and if such consent be given the motion shall not be subject to amendment, and shall be decided without debate upon the merits of the subjects proposed to be taken up."

RECESS.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, May 14, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 13, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Be graciously near to these Thy servants, Almighty Father, as they thus enter upon a new congressional week. Inspire their hearts with patriotic zeal and fervor, that their work may reach the highest level of statesmanship and redound to the good of our great Republic in this hour, which taxes our resources in means and men, at home and abroad, to uphold and sustain our God-given rights; in the Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, May 11, 1918, was read and approved.

TREASURY BALANCE ON APRIL 1, 1918.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution:

Resolution by Mr. MADDEN:

House resolution 345.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to report to the House the amount of the Treasury balance on the 1st day of April, 1918, where the same is on deposit, and the rate of interest being received from each depositary.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not know what the Speaker's construction of it is, but it does occur to me that it is not a privileged resolution, as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, until it has gone to a committee and remained there for seven days, as I understand the rules.

The SPEAKER. That is correct, but the gentleman asks unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. GARNER. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that on last Saturday I objected to the consideration of the resolution because the Treasury Department had not been consulted, and neither had any committee examined the resolution. Since that time I have talked to the Treasury people having charge of this information which this resolution seeks, and they say there is no objection to the passage of the resolution except the tremendous amount of labor that will be involved in reporting the 4,600 depositaries, the names of them, and the amount in each one. I do not object to the resolution if the gentleman from Illinois desires to take upon himself the responsibility of asking for the information, in view of the tremendous amount of labor that will be involved in furnishing it. As I remarked, I shall not object to it, though I doubt the advisability of having this amount of work performed for mere information. I can not imagine what the gentleman's purpose is in getting it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, if there is anybody connected with the Government of the United States that ought to be in possession of the information sought in this resolution, this is the body, and I am not asking for any information that ought not to be in possession of the Congress; neither am I asking for information with any purpose except that we may be properly informed. And the mere question that it requires a little more work to furnish it ought not to enter into the consideration of the problem at all.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. If it is good policy to have this information, why not have a general law requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to report to Congress every 30 days how much money he has on hand at the first of each month, the name of the depositaries, and the amount of interest he is getting from each one. I merely mention that to indicate that the gentleman must have some public service in view; and would he mind detailing to the House what it is?

Mr. MADDEN. I will. I am very anxious to find out, so far as this information will help to convey the knowledge, whether, in the face of the present situation, we need the new revenue law. That is one of the things about which I am anxious to find out, and I think this will help in that direction.

Mr. GARNER. Will the number of depositors and the amount of interest help the gentleman to determine the fact of whether there should be a revenue bill or not?

Mr. MADDEN. According to my judgment, it will help. I have no way of——

Mr. GARNER. Is that the only reason?

Mr. MADDEN. That was the only reason, and I think it is a very important one.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PASSPORTS.

Mr. FLOOD, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, and Mr. KAHN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] rise?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. To call up the conference report on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will wait a minute, the Chair will recognize him later. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] is recognized.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 10264, known as the passport bill, for the purpose of moving to concur in some unimportant amendments adopted by the Senate, so that the bill can go to the President.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the passport bill and agree to the Senate amendments. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I assume the gentleman intends to explain the minor differences in the measure.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. There are just some differences in language; some of it has been transposed. It does not affect the measure.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to ask just one question.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman do that if consent is secured?

Mr. FLOOD. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FLOOD. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I would like to ask one question. I received a telegram from a citizen of Honolulu, asking about this new passport law, and asking if travelers to and from the United States and Honolulu would have to have passports?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman think any plan can be devised by which they could be issued on the Pacific coast and in Honolulu?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes. The State Department expects to authorize officials on the Pacific coast to issue passports.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is very important, because it will be impossible to say what vessel will be sailing at an advance date necessary for the transmission of the mail. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. KITCHIN. I suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that until the regular order is demanded he explain these differences now, while the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] reserves the right to object. It will save time in that way, I think.

Mr. STAFFORD. Maybe the gentleman might wish to defer that to some future time.

Mr. GARNER. There is no real difference between the House and the Senate?

Mr. FLOOD. None whatever.

Mr. GARNER. It is a mere transposition of language. It does not change the House resolution as it went over there one whit?

Mr. FLOOD. No.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Did not the Senate put in an amendment to take care of some people in this country who might wish to travel to Alaska?

Mr. FLOOD. No; they did not. All the change they made was in reference to the use of language in one place, where the Senate thought it ought to be in another place.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I understand the gentleman, there is no material difference?

Mr. FLOOD. None whatever.

Mr. WALSH. I shall not object if that is the case.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KAHN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. KAHN. I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech delivered by Representative CHANDLER of New York, a Member of this House, at the Town and Country Club in this city a few nights ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting a speech delivered by Mr. CHANDLER of New York at the Country Club here not long ago. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This is the day set apart for the consideration of the Overman bill.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments Nos. 38 and 90 and agree to the conference asked for.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendments Nos. 38 and 90 and agree to the conference asked for. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman tell us what those amendments are? What are they?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Senate amendment numbered 38 strikes out the provision inserted by the House discontinuing the Subtreasuries six months after the war.

Senate amendment numbered 90 is the amendment relating to the compensation of employees. There are three differences between the action of the House and the action of the Senate. One of them applies to the maximum salaries to which this increase shall apply. The gentleman will remember that the House fixed the maximum salary at $2,000. The Senate has fixed the maximum at $2,500.

One of the other differences is with respect to the class of employees to whom this extra compensation will apply. The House made no distinction between employees who are paid from lump sums and those paid specified salaries. The Senate excepts from the provision allowing this increase of compensation to the employees of those commissions or governmental activities which have been created since the 1st of January, 1916. In other words, it would apply, among others, to the Food and Fuel Administration, the War Trade Board, the Alien Property Custodian, the Shipping Board, the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance, and possibly some others.

The third difference between the House and Senate lies in the Borland amendment, touching the eight-hour day, which was fixed by a provision of the House. The Senate has eliminated that particular provision from the amendment which it adopted.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The effect of the gentleman's report is to have the House stand by the House propositions on those subjects—on those three questions?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is the effect.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. COX. I want to ask the gentleman a question for information. The Senate has increased the salary to the maximum limit of $2,500. Would that increase apply to clerks of the committees of the House and Senate?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It would apply to all employees of the House and Senate who are on the roll.

Mr. COX. It would not apply to clerks of committees in the House?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It would apply to clerks of committees in the House, and, as I understand, to all employees of the Senate, because they are all on the roll. It would not apply to secretaries of House Members, because they are not on the rolls.

Mr. COX. I do not know whether this is true or not, but the word reaches me rather accurately that the clerks to committees in the Senate got exceedingly busy when this proposition was under consideration over there, and it might or might not be due to their activity that this increase was raised to $2,500. It would evidently be unfair to entail two or three million dollars, in all human probability, on the Treasury of the United States in order to take care of a few clerks to committees over in the Senate who, I think, are largely overpaid already.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. BORLAND. My understanding is that a motion to recede from the disagreement and to concur with an amendment would take precedence of the gentleman's present motion, and that would be one way, and practically the only way, for the House to get a test vote on the question of the Borland amendment for eight hours' work; but, as I understand it, that would entail an agreement by the House to this raise in the limit to $2,500, to which the increased compensation would apply, so as to take in the Senate clerks. In other words, the only way we can get a test vote on the eight-hour amendment would be to concur in the balance of the amendment with an amendment settting out the House language on the eight hours. That is the parliamentary situation, is it not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If I understand the gentleman correctly, unless the House chooses to instruct the conferees.

Mr. BORLAND. I am not willing to agree to the position of the Senate in raising the limit within which the increases of salary will be effective, up to $2,500, and I think a great many Members of the House would not be willing to do that. I would be glad to have the House in a position to express its sentiments on the question of the eight-hour day, because with this increase of salary and the present attitude in regard to allowing the clerks Saturday afternoons, and everything of that kind, I do not think the clerks are very badly oppressed, and I really think they ought to work eight hours, and I believe most of us think that. But I would rather leave it to the gentleman's committee with a full disagreement, with the House standing squarely behind the conferees of the House upon all these matters of disagreement. I think I prefer to do that, and I believe the gentleman himself would prefer to have the House do that, would he not?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course, so far as I am concerned, there could not be any objection to the House expressing its opinion upon any of the matters involved, because that is what the conferees wish to know. They will try to carry out the wishes of the House, and that is what they have endeavored to do with respect to these two amendments up to this time, but without success.

Mr. KEATING. I share the desire of the gentleman from Missouri to get a vote on the so-called Borland amendment, but for an entirely different reason. I think the House should reverse the action which it took on the Borland amendment, and should concur in the Senate amendment so far as it affects the Borland amendment.

Now, I think a direct vote on the Borland amendment may be secured in two ways. We can offer an amendment to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, this latter amendment being the House proposition minus the Borland amendment. This will bring the issue directly upon the Borland amendment.

I should like to offer that amendment, but I do not happen to have the language here, so I can not offer it unless the Clerk can read the part of the amendment which has been stricken out. I think the House should have a record vote on the Borland amendment. The vote of the Senate to strike out the Borland amendment was unanimous, and I do not think the two Houses should remain in a deadlock over so trivial a matter.

Mr. BORLAND. The two Houses are not liable to remain in a deadlock over the Borland amendment.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Would not a motion to recede and concur with the Senate on the subject of the Borland amendment be in order?

The SPEAKER. Nobody has made any such motion.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I will make it if nobody else does. I desire to make a motion to recede and concur in the action of the Senate in striking out the Borland amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BORLAND. Would it be in order to move to recede and concur with an amendment, the amendment being the original text of the House provision?

Mr. GOOD. No; that is not receding.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I make a motion to recede and concur with the action of the Senate. I move that the House recede and concur with the Senate on the striking out of the Borland amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, if I may suggest to my friend from Massachusetts, the Borland amendment is a part of another amendment. It is not a separate amendment, and if the gentleman desires to get a separate vote on the Borland amendment, his motion should be to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment, the amendment being the text of the House amendment minus the paragraph containing the Borland amendment. That will bring up the issue squarely between the two Houses.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I accept that as my motion and desire to present it—that the House recede and concur, with an amendment to strike out the Borland amendment.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will I lose the floor?

The SPEAKER. No; the gentleman has not lost the floor.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But if he yields for the presentation of the motion——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If I yield for the motion to concur with an amendment, I think I still have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has control of it.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HAMLIN rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. HAMLIN. A parliamentary inquiry. While I do not favor the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], it is a preferential motion, is it not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has decided three or four times that it is.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then he would have the right to make that motion whether the gentleman from Tennessee wanted to yield the floor or not, would he not?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee was not trying to keep the gentleman from Massachusetts from making the motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. The gentleman from Tennessee was raising the point, and I understood the Chair to agree with him, that he had the floor.

The SPEAKER. He has the floor in control of this thing clear to the end, unless he lets his hour run out without moving the previous question.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is all I wanted to know.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to make a motion to recede and concur with an amendment striking out of the House provision the Borland amendment. What I want to get at is the Borland amendment. It never ought to have been passed, and I want to knock it out, if I can.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman from Massachusetts should send his motion to the desk.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, is not this the parliamentary situation of the present case: That the gentleman from Tennessee calls up the conference report and moves that the House further insist on its disagreement, and that motion is in order? Is it not also in order for a motion to recede to be made and a motion to recede with an amendment, and these motions to be pending and to be submitted to the House in the order of preference? Under clause 4 of Rule XVI:

> When a question is under debate no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lay on the table, for the previous question (which motion shall be decided without debate), to postpone to a day certain, to refer, or to amend, or postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the foregoing order.

Is it not in order in the present case for all motions to be pending, the gentleman from Tennessee to have the floor for his hour, and when the time comes to vote on the motion of the highest order which in the present case is a motion to recede?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is correct. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts has precedence over the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee. If any gentleman had made a motion to simply recede, that would have a preferential right over the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but nobody has made that motion.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a point of order on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I would like to know what the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts really is.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is to wipe out the Borland amendment and regret that we ever put it in. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman can not put that language into his motion.

Mr. WINGO. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Do I understand that whether or not the gentleman from Tennessee is willing any Member has a right to make a motion like that of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The SPEAKER. This situation is not like a Member having the floor for an hour's debate. There are certain motions in order in a situation like this, like a motion to concur, or concur with an amendment, or recede, and so forth.

Mr. WINGO. I understand that; but the point I want to get at is, can not the gentleman from Tennessee shut off these motions by making the motion he has just made and then move the previous question?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. KEATING rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. KEATING. I rise to endeavor to clarify the motion made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I am acting at his request. The gentleman moves that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment 90, with an amendment, the latter amendment being the language of the original section as contained in the House bill, with the exception of the concluding paragraph, which paragraph has to do with what is called the Borland amendment. If adopted the result will be that the House will stand on the original proposition adopted by the House, having to do with the bonus for Government employees, with the exception of the Borland amendment.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. It would be necessary, as I take it, for the gentleman from Massachusetts to move to strike out all of the language in the Senate amendment. I doubt whether he can do that under the rules of this House, I doubt whether he can move to concur and at the same time strike out all the language of the Senate amendment and insert the language of the House amendment.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. That would be tantamount to amending the conference report.

Mr. BORLAND. It does not add new language to the Senate amendment. His motion is to substitute for the Senate amendment the original language of the House amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the Senate amendment cut out all of that substitute?

Mr. KEATING. The Senate amendment cuts out the entire section 6 of the House bill. Section 6 had to do with the increase of compensation of Government employees. The concluding paragraph of section 6 was the Borland amendment. The Senate struck out the entire section and substituted certain language. Now, I move to strike out the Senate language and substitute the House language, with the exception of the last paragraph—that is, the paragraph containing the Borland amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, that motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. Why not?

Mr. STAFFORD. For this reason: He is not moving to concur in the Senate amendment, because the Senate amendment leaves out the very matters which the gentleman from Colorado and the gentleman from Massachusetts are seeking to omit. It prolongs the disagreement rather than arriving at an agreement. The House amendment provided that we should make increases of salary of $120 in salaries up to $2,000, and excepted from its provision certain classes, and also, in addition, incorporated the limitation requiring eight hours of labor, known as the Borland amendment. The Senate adopted a different provision, not only eliminating the Borland amendment but extending to higher salaried classes of employees to which the salary increase is to be granted, and also making further limitation as to certain additional classes that should be excepted. The suggestion or motion of the gentleman from Colorado and the gentleman from Massachusetts is not to bring the two Houses together.

If the gentleman from Massachusetts or the gentleman from Colorado would move to concur in the Senate amendment it would leave out the Borland amendment, because the Senate amendment leaves it out. What are they trying to do by indirection? They are trying to move to disagree to the Senate amendment, not only as to the various differences in dispute—namely, increasing the classes to whom this extra compensation may be paid from $2,000 to $2,500—but also as to the excepted classes to whom it shall not be given. That does not bring the two Houses any nearer together; you can not do that by moving as a substitute the House provisions with a portion of it stricken out, when the Senate amendment leaves out the very provision that they wish to have eliminated. There are in disagreement two other provisions in the Senate amendment which are not included in the House amendment. You can not obtain this by indirection, by a motion to recede and concur, when you do not in effect concur at all, but merely put the two Houses back into the original stage of disagreement. This puts them back into this stage under the color of a motion to recede and concur with an amendment, but which, in fact, does not concur.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I made the motion with the intention of getting at the Borland amendment, and I am not going to yield on that.

Mr. BORLAND. I understand the gentleman wants to increase expenses.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Oh, the gentleman need not bother about that; I shall attend to that.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I think the motion made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] does bring the two Houses much nearer an understanding. There are three points in controversy in this Senate amendment.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. CRISP. I think I can suggest a remedy to gentlemen which will terminate this discussion and give everyone an opportunity to put the House on record as to the Borland amendment. Why not let the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] prevail—that the House further insist on its disagreement and ask for a further conference, and, pending the appointment of the conferees, let a motion of instruction be made, instructing the House conferees to recede from the Borland amendment; and if a majority of the House wants to recede, it can so instruct the conferees and they will recede.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, that was the thought I had in mind from the beginning—to endeavor to instruct the conferees to drop the Borland amendment—but my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] made his motion, and I thought it might be well to bring it up in that form. The suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia will reach the point, and if the Speaker will recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts at the proper time to make the motion to instruct the conferees to drop the Borland amendment, I think it would be well to accept the suggestion and end this controversy.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will do that.

Mr. BORLAND. Would it be in order to instruct the conferees to insist on the Borland amendment? Would not an affirmative instruction be in order as well as negative instruction?

The SPEAKER. It is as broad as it is long. If the motion suggested by the gentleman should prevail, then the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts would be superfluous; and if the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts should prevail, the suggested motion of the gentleman from Missouri would be superfluous. Let us get through with this other first. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee that the House further insist on its disagreement to Senate amendments numbered 38 and 90, and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I move to instruct the conferees to recede from the Borland amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts that the conferees be instructed to recede from the Borland amendment.

The question was taken.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, is it in order to move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that the conferees shall further insist on the Borland amendment?

The SPEAKER. That has all been passed. That was included in the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BORLAND. Is the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts debatable?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Was not the House dividing?

The SPEAKER. Yes; the House had begun to divide. It is too late to debate the motion.

Mr. BORLAND. I should like to be heard upon the gentleman's motion.

The SPEAKER. The House had begun to divide.

Mr. BORLAND. I was on my feet calling the attention of the Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not a mind reader and he can not tell what a Member is up for unless the Members says it.

Mr. BORLAND. Well, never mind.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KEATING) there were—ayes 149, noes 77.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors; the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 131, nays 159, answered "present" 3, not voting 137, as follows:

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, the Doorkeeper will open the doors. The Chair announces the following conferees:

The Clerk read as follows:

Messrs. BYRNS of Tennessee, EVANS, and STAFFORD.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. EDWARD L. HAMILTON, because of sickness in his family.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] asks unanimous consent for indefinite leave of absence for his colleague from Michigan [Mr. HAMILTON] on account of illness in his family. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the conference report I have a letter from the subtreasurer at St. Louis. Mr. Vandiver, concerning the Subtreasuries and their work. I would like to insert that in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to print a letter from the Hon. W. D. Vandiver, Subtreasurer at St. Louis. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
UNITED STATES SUBTREASURY,
St. Louis, Mo., April 23, 1918.

Hon. L. C. DYER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DYER: Complying with your request, I drop you a line regarding the Subtreasuries.

This office alone last year handled $350,000,000 of actual cash, receipts and disbursements. The appropriations for salaries of the office being only $31,500, you will see that the cost is considerably less than one one-hundredth part of 1 per cent of the money handled. I think I am safe in saying that no other institution of any kind in the country can show a better record than this, even if as good, and the other Subtreasuries have about the same record as this one.

Two mistaken impressions seem to have prevailed among Members of the House of Representatives who had not carefully studied the situation:

First. That the Subtreasuries are an advantage only to the cities in which they are located. The truth is that this Subtreasury serves most of the banks in seven States, besides a number of others outside, and each of the other Subtreasuries serves a corresponding territory, so that altogether they serve practically all of the banks in the United States, and in serving the banks, of course, they serve the business public; and it would be a great hindrance and delay to their business if it had to be sent to Washington, as a large part of it would necessarily have to be sent there if the Subtreasuries were abolished, because no well-informed person would be willing to have the trust funds of the Government held in private institutions.

Second. It seems to have been assumed that striking out an appropriation for the Subtreasuries would just save the Government that much money. On the contrary, that part of the work which would be done in Washington would cost at least as much, if not more, besides the inconvenience and delay in the transaction of business, and that part of it which would be transferred to the Federal reserve banks would be done by money counters and tellers who are drawing about 25 per cent higher salaries than those who are now doing it in the Subtreasuries; and as it is strictly Government work would have to be paid for by the Government, no difference where it is done, and hence would cost in the end considerably more than it is costing now. In short, I am convinced that the change instead of saving the Government a dollar would cost $100,000 more than it now costs.

This, in brief, is the true situation with reference to the Subtreasuries. If there is any point about it that is not clear, I will be glad to make it so.

Very truly, yours, W. D. VANDIVER.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, the bill (H. R. 9248) to prevent extortion, to impose taxes upon certain incomes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, had requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the bill and amendments, and had appointed Mr. SMITH of Maryland, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. DILLINGHAM, and Mr. JONES of Washington as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 4154) granting to the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Bowdoin, Mont., for the benefit of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Bowdoin, Mont., lots 12 and 13, in block 21, town site of Bowdoin, State of Montana, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. KEHOE was granted leave of absence until June 12 on account of important business.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. No. 123. Joint resolution providing for the calling into military service of certain classes of persons registered and liable for military service under the terms of the act of Congress approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10265) to authorize the President to provide housing for war needs.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a copy of a letter written to a constituent of mine in regard to war measures.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate numbered 38 and 90 to the bill (H. R. 10358) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, and had appointed Mr. MARTIN, Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CONSOLIDATION OF EXECUTIVE BUREAUS, ETC.

The SPEAKER. This is the day set apart to consider the bill S. 3771, which is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I want to see if we can not agree on time for debate.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this bill properly on the Union Calendar? Should it not be on the House Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is inclined to think that it ought to be on the House Calendar.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, before moving to go into Committee of the Whole I would like to have some agreement as to time for general debate.

Mr. GARNER. If it is on the House Calendar, you are not going into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. If it is on the House Calendar, the House will not go into the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GARNER. I did not make the point. I made an inquiry.

Mr. GILLETT. I make the point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains it, and the bill is referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. WEBB. If it is going to be discussed in the House, I want to see if we can not agree on time for general debate, and I would like to ask my brethren on the other side if they will agree to as much as five hours? I do not know that we will use it. I suggest that, however. If they want to cut it, I am willing to cut it lower.

Mr. GILLETT. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that this bill is now on the House Calendar, and therefore there is, technically, no general debate. I am inclined to agree with the gentleman that it may be well to come to an agreement that it shall be considered, as far as debate goes, as if it were in the Committee of the Whole and have general debate. But of course, technically, that can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I make the suggestion——

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], as I understand, is going to ask unanimous consent that general debate continue for so many hours.

Mr. GILLETT. That there shall be general debate?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Let me suggest to the gentleman that we have general debate and that he control one half the time and some gentleman on the other side control the other half of the time. That would be the orderly course of procedure.

Mr. WEBB. That would be the orderly course. And I ask unanimous consent that general debate on this bill shall not exceed five hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], the ranking Republican member of the committee, and that the other half be controlled by myself, and debate shall be confined to the bill. That is agreeable to gentlemen on the other side with whom I conferred, and I would not want to take advantage of any body by moving the previous question after an hour's debate or two hours' debate. I want proper debate on the bill.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, since having the conversation with the gentleman in reference to time, I find there are quite a number of others who would like to speak, and who were not taken into consideration in making that agreement. And I would like to ask that the whole day be taken up with general debate.

Mr. WEBB. That would not go more than five hours, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. GILLETT. Let me suggest to the gentleman that this is a bill that, of course, we all appreciate is of great importance, and there ought to be, as already agreed, ample debate on the bill itself. I suggest we go on to-day, the time being controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], and then when we meet to-morrow we will know whether the time is concluded or not. I think men who want to discuss it ought to have an opportunity to do so.

Mr. WEBB. I will say to my friend that I would much rather that the House agree upon some definite time limit for general debate.

Mr. GILLETT. We do not know how many men want time in general debate.

Mr. WEBB. And if at the end of that time any men desire to seriously discuss the bill, I will have no objection to some extension of the time.

Mr. GILLETT. With that understanding it is all right.

Mr. WEBB. I have so stated to the gentleman from Minnesota and other gentlemen. That is my feeling about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. With pleasure.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, at the end of that time it is the privilege of the gentleman having charge of the bill to move the previous question. Would it not be more satisfactory in the consideration of a bill of this importance, to at the conclusion of the so-called general debate ask that it be considered under the five minute rule for amendment?

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] any request to make?

Mr. WEBB. I ask, Mr. Speaker, that general debate be limited to not exceeding five hours, and that the debate be confined to the provisions of the bill, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and one-half to be controlled by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent, the general rules of the House to the contrary notwithstanding, that the general debate on this bill shall not exceed five hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], and that the debate be confined to the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think it only fair to state to the House that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] are both in favor of this bill. Now, I do not know whether it should be thought proper that some one opposed to the bill should have something to do with controlling the time. I only make that suggestion. I have no desire——

Mr. CANNON. Is there anybody opposed to it?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Reserving the right to object, I would like to make the point of order that it would be contrary to the rules of the House to limit the general debate simply to the bill.

Mr. GARNER. That is only in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. This bill is a House bill, and the gentleman from North Carolina has an hour, which he can yield in that time, and the debate would have to be confined to the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I object to limiting it to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects, and the Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I move that the general debate on this bill shall not exceed five hours, and that one-half of the time shall be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and one-half by myself.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I do not object to that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, that is out of order. The Speaker could not recognize such a motion.

Mr. KITCHIN. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, it would have to be by unanimous consent.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will be reasonable.

Mr. WEBB. We are willing to have general debate. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] apparently wants to cut it off.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. If we are to have general debate, let it be general debate.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. I want to make a parliamentary inquiry for the benefit of the gentleman from Massachusetts, but I do not believe I can get his attention.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Of course you can.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] in charge of the bill, should see proper to debate it five minutes and then move the previous question on the bill, what would be the result?

The SPEAKER. The result would be that the Chair would put the motion.

Mr. WEBB. We want to have five hours' debate.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I am willing to have it. I do not object to five hours. I do object to limiting general debate.

Mr. WEBB. I make that request for unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that, the rules of the House to the contrary, there shall be five hours' general debate on this bill and no more, and that he shall control half the time and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] the other half, and that the debate be confined to the bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I simply want to understand from the gentleman that in case gentlemen who are not members of the Committee on the Judiciary desire to speak, they shall have opportunity.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that five hours shall be devoted to general debate, notwithstanding the rule, and that he shall have control of one half the time and the gentleman from Minnesota the other half.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood the gentleman would be liberal in extending time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, do I understand, if this request is agreed to in that form, the debate will not be confined to the bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for one hour. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 3771) authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, for the better utilization of resources and industries, and for the more effective exercise and more efficient administration by the President of his powers as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces the President is hereby authorized to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, in such manner as in his judgment shall seem best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act, and to this end is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as he may deem necessary, which regulations and orders shall be in writing and shall be filed with the head of the department affected and constitute a public record: Provided That this act shall remain in force during the continuance of the present war and for six months after the termination of the war by the proclamation of the treaty of peace, or at such earlier time as the President may designate: Provided further, That the termination of this act shall not affect any act done or any right or obligation accruing or accrued pursuant to this act and during the time that this act is in force: Provided further, That the authority by this act granted shall be exercised only in matters relating to the conduct of the present war.

SEC. 2. That in carrying out the purposes of this act the President is authorized to utilize, coordinate, or consolidate any executive or administrative commissions, bureaus, agencies, offices, or officers now existing by law, to transfer any duties or powers from one existing department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer to another, to transfer the personnel thereof or any part of it either by detail or assignment, together with the whole or any part of the records and public property belonging thereto.

SEC. 3. That the President is further authorized to establish an executive agency which may exercise such jurisdiction and control over the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment as in his judgment may be advantageous; and, further, to transfer to such agency, for its use, all or any moneys heretofore appropriated for the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment.

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, any moneys heretofore and hereafter appropriated for the use of any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer shall be expended only for the purposes for which it was appropriated under the direction of such other agency as may be directed by the President hereunder to perform and execute said function.

SEC. 5. That should the President, in redistributing the functions among the executive agencies as provided in this act, conclude that any bureau should be abolished and it or their duties and functions conferred upon some other department or bureau or eliminated entirely, he shall report his conclusions to Congress with such recommendations as he may deem proper.

SEC. 6. That all laws or parts of laws conflicting with the provisions of this act are to the extent of such conflict suspended while this act is in force.

Upon the termination of this act all executive or administrative agencies, departments, commissions, bureaus, offices, or officers shall exercise the same functions, duties, and powers as heretofore or as hereafter by law may be provided, any authorization of the President under this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I think there has been much said really of a nature to misrepresent the objects and purposes of this bill. I want to be brief, because I believe that nearly every Member of the House has made up his mind how he expects to vote upon it. The bill passed the Senate by a vote of 63 to 13. It was adopted after it was debated off and on over there for six weeks, and it has been discussed in the public press fully, and I think the House is determined now as to how it shall vote upon this measure.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want merely to suggest this: The gentleman gave the figures by which the bill passed the Senate by a very large majority. It would be well to state that the vote on several of the amendments to the bill were very narrow. In fact, one was defeated by only one vote.

Mr. WEBB. I do not know as to that.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill gives the President the power simply to redistribute and coordinate or consolidate the functions, powers, and offices of the executive and administrative branches of the Government in the interest of the national defense, the successful prosecution of the war, and for the more efficient administration of the executive branches of the Government. That is as complete a statement as I can make of the purposes and provisions of the bill in that brief compass.

It will be seen, to detail them just briefly, that in the first section it is provided that for the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, for the better utilization of the resources and industries, and for the more effective exercise and more efficient administration by the President of his powers as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces the President is authorized to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary, and so forth.

Then there is a proviso in that section to this effect, that the act shall not continue in force longer than six months after the war is ended. Then there is a second proviso to the effect that the termination of this act shall not affect any act done or any right or obligation accruing or accrued pursuant to the act during the time that the act is in force. The third proviso is that the authority by this act granted shall be exercised only in matters relating to the conduct of the present war.

Section 2 provides that the President is authorized to utilize, coordinate, or consolidate any executive or administrative commissions, bureaus, agencies, offices, or officers now existing by law; to transfer any duties or powers from one existing department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer to another; to transfer the personnel thereof or any part of it, either by detail or assignment, together with the whole or any part of the records or public property belonging thereto.

Section 3 was adopted on the floor of the Senate and provides that the President is authorized to establish an executive agency which shall exercise such jurisdiction and control over the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment as in his judgment may be advantageous, and to transfer to such agency all or any moneys heretofore appropriated for the production of airplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment.

Section 4 of the bill provides that all money heretofore and hereafter appropriated for use of any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officers shall be expended only for the purpose for which it was appropriated under the direction of such other agency as may be directed by the President to perform and execute said function.

Section 5 provides that the President, in redistributing the functions among the executive agencies, as provided in this act, if he concludes that any bureau shall be abolished and its duties and functions conferred upon some other department or bureau, or eliminated entirely, he shall report his conclusions to Congress with such recommendation as he may deem proper.

Section 6 repeals all laws and parts of laws contrary to this act and provides that upon the termination of the act all executive and administrative agencies, departments, commissions, and so forth, together with their duties and powers as heretofore or as hereafter provided by law, any authorization of the President under this act to the contrary notwithstanding, shall terminate and go back to the status quo before the bill was passed.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Under the next to the last section, do I understand the gentleman's interpretation of the bill to be that the President can not abolish a bureau without the consent of Congress?

Mr. WEBB. That is the correct interpretation. He can abolish a bureau temporarily, during the existence of this act. In case he thinks a bureau should be abolished permanently, he is only given the power to report to Congress, with the recommendation as to why he thinks it should be permanently abolished.

Mr. RAMSEYER. He has the power to take one bureau and put it into another or to take two or more and combine them.

Mr. WEBB. That is all, and he is requested to report to Congress if he thinks it should be permanently abolished.

Mr. McCORMICK. Is he requested or required?

Mr. WEBB. The language is "shall report to Congress."

Mr. RAMSEYER. Could the President abolish a department?

Mr. WEBB. Does the gentleman mean permanently?

Mr. RAMSEYER. No; during the war.

Mr. WEBB. He could suspend a department to that extent; yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. But within six months after the war all the original powers of the department would be restored to it.

Mr. WEBB. Would be restored just as they were before the act was passed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this House realizes that some such measure as this not only ought to be passed now, but ought to have been passed long ago. The Congress has been trying in some way or other to pass a measure which would enable somebody to coordinate the multifarious administrative and executive branches of our Government, to bring them to a standard out of which we may get the greatest efficiency. Mr. Taft, Mr. Hughes, the Efficiency Board, and Congress itself have realized that situation. There are numerous duplications of work in the departments. Senator Aldrich a few years ago said that the administrative part of this Government ought to be run with a saving of $300,000,000 a year. He did not mean to criticize Congress for appropriating too much money. His idea was that if good business principles were applied in the executive departments of this Government and if the Government were run as a big business institution $300,000,000 could be saved annually.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. When did Senator Aldrich say that? I heard that repeated a great many times, even before I came to Congress. How long ago was it?

Mr. WEBB. It was since I have been a Member of Congress. It must have been 6 or 8 or 10 years ago.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What was the amount of the annual expenditure at that time?

Mr. WEBB. I do not remember. I suppose we had gotten up to pretty nearly a billion dollars a year.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. As much as $750,000,000?

Mr. WEBB. Somewhere along there.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Was not that a pretty large saving to be expected?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If that was true then, it is certainly true now.

Mr. WEBB. I think so, because we are spending more money, and the proportion of saving ought to be the same.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to hear the gentleman's statement. Is the gentleman going to explain these sections a little more in detail? If not, I should like to have some further explanation of section 3, wherein the President is authorized to establish an executive agency in connection with aeroplane production.

Mr. WEBB. I will have to refer my friend to Senator WADSWORTH's speech in the Senate on that subject. I believe he was the author of the amendment, and it was adopted by the Senate. While I do not know the details of his reasons for it, it seems to me a very good provision. The Senate adopted it, I think, by a very large vote.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it the gentleman's impression that if such an executive agency—because that is the term used—were created, it would take it away from the supervision and oversight of Congress?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, no. As long as Congress has the power under the Constitution to appropriate money, nothing is to be taken away from the Congress, and nothing ought to be. Congress still has control over them all.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Throughout the bill I observe there is no provision for a report to Congress of any of the orders or regulations that the President may make under this bill.

Mr. WEBB. No; unless he thinks some department ought to be abolished. Then he shall report to Congress his reasons for it, and let Congress act upon it, to determine what shall be done.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Under section 5, if he should deem it wise that Congress should abolish a certain bureau, he would report to Congress, but in no other instance is he to report to Congress.

Mr. WEBB. No; and they are making transfers every day in the executive departments under authority heretofore granted by Congress. We have given the President and some heads of departments the power to make transfers for the last 10 or 15 years, and have not required them to report to Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Suppose the President should transfer the Bureau of Mines to the Food Administration, Mr. Hoover being a mining engineer?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, I hope my friend will not ask any such unreasonable questions as that. The President has both sense and patriotism.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I am not asking anything unreasonable any more than the report does, for it offers certain suggestions on this line. I want to know whether the committee would have any objection to providing for a report to Congress by the President of such changes as he may make.

Mr. WEBB. I would object to it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman would object to it?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. I do not think the President or anybody under him, in a time of war like this, when everybody is straining every nerve to win this war, ought to be required to make a detailed report of every little change that may be made among the 300,000 employees of the Government.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If he consolidates two departments, ought not Congress to be informed?

Mr. WEBB. Congress would be informed. There will be a public record of his act and the gentleman can go and examine it after it is filed.

Now, when I was interrupted I was about to say that there is a general acknowledgment of the necessity for some such law as this. Congress has recognized it. Public men generally have recognized it, and this Congress has recognized it. Now, the question is, what is the best way to do it? This bill may not be a perfect solution of the question, but it is the best thing we have had before us so far. The gentlemen who sponsored what was known as the war-cabinet bill realized that something of this sort ought to be done. On January 21, 1918, there was introduced in the Senate by Senator CHAMBERLAIN a bill known as the war-cabinet bill, which among other things provided that this war cabinet should be composed of three distinguished citizens, and so forth. Subsection b under section 2 provides for giving these three distinguished gentlemen the following powers.

I hope gentlemen will listen to this, because the bill was indorsed by Republicans and Democrats alike in the Senate, and it contains this power which was proposed to be used by "three distinguished gentlemen":

To supervise, coordinate, direct, and control the functions and activities of all executive departments, officials, and agencies of the Government in so far, in the judgment of the war cabinet, as it may be necessary or advisable to do so for the effectual conduct and vigorous prosecution of the existing war.

The gentlemen who drew the bill now being considered might have covered the whole material ground by using that language. That was advocated by many distinguished Republicans in the Senate, and I read it for the purpose of showing that the gentlemen who drew and sponsored this bill recognized the necessity of some means of coordinating and redistributing and readjusting the departments of the Government that are numerously duplicated.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What became of that bill?

Mr. WEBB. It is still pending in the Senate, I believe.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But it has no indorsement.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I think there was liberal hearings on it, and I think speeches have been made on it. I know the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] made a strong speech favoring it.

Mr. FOCHT. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. FOCHT. The gentleman having alluded to this in the course of his argument, does the gentleman believe we should have a war cabinet?

Mr. WEBB. No; I do not think it is necessary. The President is war cabinet enough under the Constitution, and he does not need "three distinguished citizens" to divide his duties.

Mr. FOCHT. Then what becomes of the gentleman's argument upon this bill?

Mr. WEBB. This is the only thing we have looking to the coordination and redistribution of the administrative departments of the Government, and therefore we ought to vote for it. It is the only bill we have before us. Now, Mr. Taft in his message in 1911, as President of the United States, saw the necessity of some such legislation as this. On March 13, 1911, he sent a message to Congress in which he says:

There has been inadequate means whereby those who serve with fidelity and efficiency might make a record of accomplishment and be distinguished from those who were inefficient and wasteful; functions and establishments have even been duplicated, even multiplied, a useless conflict and unnecessary expense; lack of full information has made intelligent direction impossible and cooperation between different branches of the service difficult.

Senator LODGE offered other reasons, as follows:

In the past, services have been created one by one as exigencies have seemed to demand, with little or no reference to any scheme of organization of the Government as a whole. I am convinced that the time has come when the Government should take stock of all its activities and agencies and formulate a comprehensive plan with reference to which future changes may be made. The report of the commission is being prepared with this idea in mind. When completed, it will be transmitted to the Congress. The recommendations will be of such a character that they can be acted upon by one if they commend themselves to the Congress and as action in regard to any one of them is deemed to be urgent.

Now, the Congress provided for the establishment of a commission, or Bureau of Efficiency and Economy. You will find it in Document 1552, Sixty-second Congress, wherein this efficiency board reports:

This vast organization has never been studied in detail as one piece of administrative mechanism. Never have the foundations been laid for a thorough consideration of the relations of all its parts. No comprehensive effort has been made to list its multifarious activities or to group them in such a way as to present a clear picture of what the Government is doing. Never has a complete description been given of the agencies through which these activities are performed. At no time has the attempt been made to study all of these activities and agencies with a view to the assignment of each activity to the agency best fitted for its performance, to the avoidance of duplication of plant and work, to the integration of all administrative agencies of the Government, so far as may be practicable, into a unified organization for the most effective and economical dispatch of public business.

Now, in 1918, this Congress, still reaching out and trying to meet the very situation in the executive departments we are confronted with now, passed the legislative appropriation bill, which contains a provision in section 8 as follows:

The Bureau of Efficiency shall investigate duplication of service in the various executive departments and establishments of the Government, including bureaus and divisions, and make a report to the President thereon, and the President is hereby authorized after such report shall have been made to him, wherever he finds such duplications to exist, to abolish the same. Report of the action taken hereunder shall be made to Congress at its next regular session.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall not quote what the distinguished citizen, Mr. Hughes, said on this subject, but he in public speeches has pointed out the necessity for coordination and redistribution of the functions, powers, and offices of the executive and administrative branches of the Government.

I shall also, with the permission of the House, insert some editorials from leading papers—I think most of them Republican papers—but they are to the point and cover the ground very clearly.

Here is a portion of an editorial from The Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin of New York, of March 22, 1918. I will read a part of it:

[Editorial from The Journal of Commerce and Commercial Bulletin (N. Y.), Mar. 22, 1918.]

No doubt a variety of objections will be raised to this, or to anything else making executive action more effective, but it seems to be believed at Washington that it will be passed without material change or any considerable negative vote. It ought to be without any prolonged debate or the too familiar use of excited language. There is really in it no occasion for getting excited. It confers no increased executive power, and would only concentrate its direction and use, so as to make it more prompt and effective instead of running over red tape through a complex variety of machines and coming out in a snarl. The various parts of this machinery are created by legislative action and may be increased or diminished in number or capacity and modified in functions. The great need is to have them work in harmony to accomplish the desired results as perfectly and promptly as may be in a continuous and necessary service. If it were a private business, there would be no doubt or difference of opinion about it. Why in a public service of so much consequence? Are private business men so much more trustworthy than public servants?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Is it not a fact that practically all of the leading newspapers and magazines have indorsed the bill?

Mr. WEBB. I think that statement is generally true.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. In section 1 there is the usual provision, which is carried in all of the war bills, that this shall remain in force during the continuance of the present war and for six months thereafter. Then follows the provision that the termination of the act shall not affect any act done or right or obligation accruing or accrued pursuant to this act. Is it the gentleman's understanding, notwithstanding the first provision in the bill, that when the war terminates all of these consolidations will continue as they have been consolidated?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, no; they will go back just as they were before the act is passed, unless in the meantime Congress, on the recommendation of the President, has abolished some department or branch.

Mr. SNOOK. This consolidation will exist only during the term of the war unless we have permanent legislation otherwise?

Mr. WEBB. Absolutely. That is what the bill means. Mr. Speaker, some men in an excited moment have argued that this is giving the President too much power; that it makes him an autocrat, and all that sort of thing. I do not think their language is justified, in the least. It certainly is not deserved, because there are distinguished lawyers in the Senate and throughout the country who believe that the President of the United States has now the power to do just exactly what we propose to give him the power to do in this bill, and I desire to read what Senator KNOX said in the Senate upon this question, and we all recognize him as one of the leading lawyers of the country. Here is what he said——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). Of course, the Chair has no objection to the gentleman reading what a Senator said——

Mr. WEBB. I propose to read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I am not criticizing what the Senator said, but commending him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is made the duty of the Chair under the rules of the House to direct attention to the fact that what has been said in the Senate in an official way shall not be commented upon on the floor of the House.

Mr. WEBB. I think that is so, and I am not intending to comment upon it. I merely propose to read what he said as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, in order to save time I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina may read, as he suggests, from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I would not, of course, consciously violate even technically any of the rules of the House, but I know the Members of the House know Senator KNOX to be a distinguished lawyer, and I desire simply to quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and I am obliged to the House for giving me the privilege of doing so. He said:

I think the President of the United States has the authority to require every executive officer and every department of the Government to do anything that he directs to be done in order to prosecute this war to a successful conclusion. I think he has the power to delegate from one Cabinet officer to another the discharge of any particular duty that he thinks such a Cabinet officer can discharge better than the one upon whom it would normally be incumbent. I do certainly think that the President has all those powers.

If the President of the United States had any autocratic feeling in his bosom, if he desired to run over, as we would say, the wishes of this Congress that by appropriations have established these various branches of the Government, he would do like Abraham Lincoln did—he would cut the red tape without consulting Congress, he would do as Senator KNOX has suggested he has the power to do; and I can not speak too highly of his act or too highly commend the President of the United States in these days, when we talk so much about centralization of power and when the people want to retain in their hands as much as is proper to make this war successful, for his coming to Congress and saying that he would like to have this power granted to him, which great men say that he already has; but instead of ignoring Congress he comes to us and says, "If I did so I would probably be criticized for it, and I would like to have you give me the express and clear power to make these coordinations and redistributions wherever they may be proper and necessary to help win the war. I would like to have your authority." As I say, I can not too highly praise the President of the United States for doing that, rather than taking the step of his own motion, which some Senators and some public men think he has the right to do.

I want now to read what Senator MCCUMBER says:

Mr. President, I shall vote for this bill, and I shall vote for it either with the proposed amendments or without the proposed amendments. I think it but fair, however, to say that I do not attach the importance to this bill that has been indicated by the long period of time it has been before the Senate and the long and earnest speeches that have been made both for and against its provisions. All of the important powers that are granted in this bill are either powers that are already inherent in the Chief Magistrate or powers that have been granted specially by the Constitution or powers which we, during this last Congress, have especially delegated to the President. When we examine the full scope and extent of those powers we will find that there are few left to be covered by the provisions of this bill.

I repeat, I can not regard this bill as of the same degree of importance as do many Senators in this body. I am not fearful of the authority that will be exercised under it; but as the President seems to think that he needs the additional authority, as he seems to believe that he can better carry this war to a successful issue if the bill be passed, I am willing to grant the power to him, so that, at least, I shall not be criticized and shall not allow Congress to be criticized by reason of my vote in not supporting the President in everything that he or Congress can possibly deem necessary for the successful prosecution of the war.

Mr. Speaker, there is no unusual power granted in this bill. I can not understand how gentlemen will complain of the power we grant here when they have already within the last 12 months voted to give the President a thousand times greater and more important power to exercise at his discretion. It will not do for men who voted to conscript two or three million of the boys of the country to be turned over to the direction of one man—the President—to say now, "While I voted to trust all of these boys in his care, I am not willing to trust him with the coordination of a few of the executive functions of the Government of the United States." In the food-control bill we gave the President far greater power than it is proposed to give him in this bill. Listen to this language:

Whenever during the present war the President shall find that the public safety shall so require and shall make proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export from or ship from or take out of the United States to any country named in such proclamation any article or articles mentioned in such proclamation.

That is one of the most magnificent tributes that a Congress ever paid to a President of the United States. We turned over to him the power to practically starve the United States, if he were a bad man and wanted to do it—to absolutely stop all exportations of manufactured or raw material produced in this country. You put it in his discretion to say what articles shall or shall not be exported or received. Let us not now strain at gnats when we have already swallowed camels. We trusted the President then in big things and we will trust him now.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that in section 2 of the food-control bill, authorizing the carrying out of the purposes of the act, the President was given the power to utilize any department or agency of the Government and to coordinate their activities so as to avoid any preventable loss or duplication of effort.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I am very glad my friend called the attention of the House to that provision. Now, there is another provision of the food-control bill which provides—

That whenever the President finds it essential in order to prevent undue enhancement, depression, or fluctuation of prices of, or in order to prevent injurious speculation in, or in order to prevent unjust market manipulation or unfair and misleading market quotations of the prices of necessaries, hereafter in this section called evil practices, he is authorized to prescribe such regulations governing, or may either wholly or partly prohibit, operations, practices, and transactions at, on, in, or under the rules of any exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business as he may find essential in order to prevent, correct, or remove such evil practices.

Gentlemen, if there was to be any talk about a dictatorship, if there was to be talk of the question of powers granted to the Chief Executive, the time was then if there was any time at all, but we trusted the President then as we are going to trust him now. Civilization is so constituted that you must trust somebody in every step in life. You can not sit down and eat a meal without trusting the cook not to put something in it that will kill you. Every time you walk across the street you trust somebody, and in this great war of the world, out of 1,600,000,000 peoples 1,444,000,000 are engaged, the most stupendous and tremendous war that has ever taken place since the morning stars sang together, it is imperative that we trust the Executive head of this great Government, which is now a part and parcel of this conflagration. I appeal to Members on both sides of the House, I appeal to my Republican friends not to vote against this bill on the ground that you can not trust the President whom you so fully trusted before, because you fear he may make some wrong distribution of an executive branch of the Government. I commend Republicans for the splendid patriotism that they have shown since war was declared and I know that they will show the same patriotism now that they have shown heretofore. I have no criticism of the Republican patriotism in their splendid expressions of loyalty to our Chief Executive, the President, who happens to be from a party different from theirs. I appreciate their attitude and I appreciate the attitude of the Republicans on the Committee on the Judiciary, and, as I said in the beginning I can not understand why there should be so much talk and objection to a bill that appears to be so useful and necessary in these serious times and at the same time so harmless, in the hands of a wise man like the President of the United States. He has not abused the power we have given him before and I do not believe there is a man in this Congress who would be willing to say he believes the President would abuse this power or that he has abused the powers given him by us in the past. Now, that is all that I care to say at the present, unless some gentleman desires to ask me a question.

Mr. ROBBINS. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the purpose of the proviso in line 17, page 2, which reads:

That the authority by this act granted shall be exercised only in matters relating to the conduct of the present war.

Are not there many other departments of the Government from which this bill is intended to remove the so-called red tape, duplication, and delays?

Mr. WEBB. I think the bill should cover other departments; but this is a war-time measure, and let us confine it to that phase.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then why——

Mr. WEBB. I think all the executive branches ought to be gone over with a fine-tooth comb by some splendid efficiency board and a comprehensive recommendation made to this Congress, so that duplication may be abolished. Why have six or eight auditors in the various departments and many departments doing the same work that other departments are doing? I have printed in the report which I presented on the part of the Judiciary Committee a brief memorandum showing some of the duplications now in the executive branches of the Government.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. With pleasure.

Mr. FESS. Section 5 provides that in case any bureau should be abolished the President could make recommendation here. Section 2, it seems to me, gives him the power virtually to abolish the bureau by transferring all its elements to some other function. Is not that possible?

Mr. WEBB. I think that a bureau can be abolished during the life of this act, but it can not be abolished longer than that unless when the President thinks the bureau ought to be abolished he then shall report to Congress his recommendation, and Congress then must pass a law saying that it shall be abolished; otherwise it would go back as it was before any action was taken by the President under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. FESS. Then, in the gentleman's judgment, there is no irreconciliability of the element——

Mr. WEBB. No; I do not think so. I think it is clear that during the life of the act the President can abolish or suspend the functions of the various executive departments and that his action can not be made permanent until he reports to Congress and Congress ratifies his action in this respect.

Mr. LOBECK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. For a question.

Mr. LOBECK. This power would cover these commissions and boards which have been made since the war commenced, in some of which work is being duplicated?

Mr. WEBB. It will cover every executive and administrative function of the Government now existing under authority of law passed by Congress.

Mr. LOBECK. It takes in these boards created since the war began?

Mr. WEBB. Which are now established by law. Of course it will not take in executive branches established after this bill is passed, because this bill refers only to those branches now established by law.

Mr. LOBECK. I shall be very glad to vote for the bill.

Mr. WEBB. Before sitting down I believe I will renew my request. I think it is the almost unanimous desire of the Members of the House that we shall have five hours of general debate on this bill, two hours and a half of that to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and two hours and a half by myself——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has occupied 35 minutes.

Mr. WEBB. I desire to have that charged up to me, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that there may be five hours of general debate, one-half of that time to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and the 35 minutes used by the gentleman from North Carolina to be charged to him.

Mr. WEBB. And, of course, I want to include in that the request that the debate shall be confined to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And that debate be confined to the bill, and at the end of the general debate——

Mr. WEBB. I will have another unanimous-consent request to make.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman to retain the right to the floor. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that there may be not exceeding five hours of general debate, one-half of that time to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]; that debate be confined to the bill; and that at the conclusion of general debate he may have recognition to prefer a further request if he may desire, or move the previous question. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. With pleasure.

Mr. WALSH. Does that include that there will be opportunity to discuss this measure under the five-minute rule as in the committee?

Mr. WEBB. It is my purpose at the end of general debate to make such request, if this request is granted for general debate.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would give opportunity to offer amendments?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. NORTON. It is not the intention to close general debate to-day, is it?

Mr. WEBB. It depends on whether the House would stay here to-night. Of course, I can not say. I hope to get through with the bill by to-morrow night, anyway.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Of course, the gentleman will understand that in consideration of the House bill there is really no five-minute rule. The Chair understands the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] desires to arrange that later?

Mr. WALSH. Ordinarily there is no general debate, but just debate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it the understanding that the time used by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] shall be taken out?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was included. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 2½ hours, less the 35 minutes which he has used.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy no more of the time at present, and I am much obliged to the House for the attention they have given me. [Applause.]

I would like if the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] would use some of his time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration (S. 3771) is entitled "An act authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government."

The object of the bill is stated in the first section. It is—for the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, for the better utilization of resources and industries, and for the more effective exercise and more efficient administration by the President of his powers as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces.

With this object in view, the bill authorizes the President—to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, in such manner as in his judgment shall seem best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act.

There are several limitations in the bill. Among these may be mentioned the following:

First, the act shall remain in force only during the continuance of the present war and for six months after its termination.

Second, the authority granted by the act shall be exercised only in matters relating to the conduct of the present war.

In carrying out the purposes of the act, the President is authorized—

(a) To utilize, coordinate, or consolidate any executive or administrative commissions, bureaus, agencies, offices, or officers now existing by law.

(b) To transfer any duties or powers from one existing department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer to another.

(c) To transfer the personnel thereof or any part of it either by detail or assignment, together with the whole or any part of the records and public property belonging thereto.

AIRCRAFT EXECUTIVE AGENCY.

Section 3 of the act authorizes the President—to establish an executive agency which may exercise such jurisdiction and control over the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment as in his judgment may be advantageous; and, further, to transfer to such agency, for its use, all or any moneys heretofore appropriated for the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment.

A WAR MEASURE.

In determining whether or not this bill should be passed we must take into consideration the position in which the country is now situated. We are engaged in war. The prosecution of this war to a speedy, successful, and victorious conclusion is now the one great task before the American people. War is now more than our chief business. It overshadows and dominates everything else. We have staked everything upon the defeat, the overthrow, and the annihilation of the Imperial German Government. The work before us is by far the greatest undertaking in which the American people have ever been engaged. The situation is such as to demand the utilization of all of our wealth, all our resources, all our institutions, and all the physical, intellectual, and moral strength and power of the American people. Nothing should be reserved in this struggle. The duty and obligation to aid in the prosecution of this war falls upon all alike. Those who can not fight in the trenches must fight at home. War necessarily interferes with the normal business of the country. In like manner, the business of war places new, difficult, and extraordinary activities upon the machinery of our National Government. In considering this bill, we must therefore bear in mind that we are not legislating for times of peace. In granting the power which this bill confers upon the President, we must have in mind the crisis which now confronts the Nation; we must remember the great danger which overshadows the American people; we must recognize the supreme importance of making the National Government as efficient as possible; and we must realize that by every appropriate means we must uphold the hands of the Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces of the United States.

NO TIME TO PLAY POLITICS.

Mr. Speaker, I have studied this bill somewhat carefully. I have read the most of the speeches made on the bill during its lengthy discussion in the Senate. As a member of the Judiciary Committee, I was present and listened to the discussion of the bill there. In reaching a conclusion to support the bill I have not taken in consideration the interests of my party. I am a Republican. I am a strong believer in the principles and policies of the Republican Party. But during the continuation of this war it is the duty of both the great political parties to hold their peculiar political principles and policies in abeyance. All minds and all political parties and all the energies of the Nation should be concentrated on winning the war. We can all stand on a platform of loyalty and patriotism. In accepting volunteers for the Army and Navy we put no political test. In selecting men for the National Army we accepted no one on account of his political faith, and we excused no one because of his party affiliations. Republicans, Democrats, and Socialists are in our training camps, on our warships, in the trenches, and on the firing line. Our brave soldiers and sailors and their officers are not divided into political camps. The fathers and mothers who gave these boys to the country are rightfully thinking of their safety and success on the battle field. That is what they are thinking about. The people at home who are doing war work in numerous lines of activity are not thinking of political campaigns or party success. The nearly 20,000,000 of persons who subscribed to the third liberty loan did not buy bonds as a political contribution. Those who are supporting the Red Cross, the Y. M. C. A., and the splendid activities of the various fraternal and religious organizations are not doing it in behalf of any party or political organization. So Members of Congress, in enacting war legislation, should say to their political prejudices, "Get thee behind me, Satan," move out into the higher and purer atmosphere of loyalty, and stand squarely upon the solid, immovable, and imperishable rock of patriotism.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS.

I am for this bill as it stands, and I am for it with any amendments that will improve it. But I will not vote for amendments which are based upon the idea that the President can not be trusted with the power herein granted. I will not vote for any amendment which is founded upon the fear that the President will abuse the power herein granted. I will not vote for any amendment which reflects upon the ability, the judgment, or the patriotism of the President. [Applause.]

I regard it as very important that during this war the people shall have confidence in our Chief Executive. It would greatly weaken our Nation in the prosecution of this war if a very considerable percentage of our citizens should lose faith in the man whom they have chosen as the Chief Executive, and who, by virtue of the provisions of the Constitution, is the Commander in Chief of our land and naval forces. To win this war there must be great unanimity of sentiment in favor of its prosecution. A divided nation can hardly conduct a war successfully. Whoever does anything or says anything to shake the confidence of the people in the man who directs the affairs of the Nation, and commands our Army and Navy, however good his motives may be, is nevertheless detracting from the efficiency and potency of the American people in the prosecution of the war.

What I shall constribute to help win this war probably will not be worth mentioning. But one thing I shall not do. I shall not knowingly do anything that will hinder those who have the responsibility of directiong the war. I may not be able to push much, but I shall not pull back. If I can not be a propelling force, I can avoid, and I will avoid, being an obstructionist. [Applause.]

CONSTITUTIONALITY.

It has been charged that some of the provisions of this bill are unconstitutional. It is said that Congress, by passing this bill, would be abdicating its power. It is asserted that the provisions of this bill confer legislative power upon the Executive. I shall not undertake to discuss, at any length, the constitutionality of the provisions of this bill. I revere the Constitution. I do not believe we should vote for laws that are unconstitutional. For myself, however, I do not believe the provisions of the bill are unconstitutional.

I have been in Congress now more than nine years. During this time, in the consideration of almost every important measure, some one has asserted that it was unconstitutional. It is a charge that is frequently made against pending legislation. I do not criticize those who are champions of the Constitution or those who are in the habit of scrutinizing every measure carefully to see that it is not in conflict therewith. In the nine years which I have been in this House many important measures have been passed. Few of them have been held unconstitutional. Even in peace, I think the Congress of the United States can enact almost any legislation that it deems necessary for the public welfare.

I do not believe in the doctrine that in time of war the Constitution is silent, but there are war powers granted in the Constitution. These grants of power should be given the most liberal construction. They apply to a time of great peril. The laws enacted for war purposes are only temporary. They are to cease when peace is restored. I want to preserve the Constitution; I want to perpetuate all of our free institutions; I want to maintain the rights and privileges of every citizen; but defeat in this war would mean the overthrow of our Constitution, the destruction of our free institutions, and the loss of the very rights, privileges, freedom, and liberties which the Constitution vouchsafes to every American citizen.

The Constitution specifically authorizes Congress to raise and support armies; to provide and maintain a Navy; to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; and, further, it specifically declares that Congress shall have power "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any deparment or officer thereof." These provisions are clear, specific, broad, and all comprehensive. What is known as the general-welfare clause of the Constitution, in my opinion, was not placed in the Constitution by accident. It was wisely placed there so that Congress would have the power to meet every emergency which would arise. It was placed there in order that the Republic should at all times, and under all circumstances, and in every emergency, have the power of self-preservation. As Members of the Congress, charged with the duty and responsibility of war legislation, it should be an inspiration to us that our forefathers, through the Constitution, did not authorize the Chief Executive or the judiciary to provide "for the common defense and general welfare." That great duty, power, and responsibility was placed upon Congress. We should have this in mind when considering so-called war legislation. I have the greatest confidence in Congress. I believe that Senators and Representatives are doing their utmost to faithfully perform all the sacred duties which the Constitution confers upon them. I do not question the good faith, loyalty, or patriotism of those who do not agree with me. But, for myself, I do not believe that now is the time to split hairs over the constitutionality of proposed war legislation. Doubtful constitutional questions shall not deter me from voting for this bill, which I believe, in some measure, will aid those in authority to lead the American people to the goal of victory. I have great veneration for the Constitution, but while this war lasts, on war measures I shall take a chance on their constitutionality if I am convinced that thereby I can save the life of one American soldier or sailor.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION AND OTHER GOVERNMENTAL AGENCIES.

Since this bill has been under consideration by Congress there has been a demand that certain governmental commissions and boards should be exempted from its provisions. It has been strenuously argued that its provisions should not apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, the Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Farm Loan Board, the War Finance Corporation, the Government Printing Office, and the Library of Congress. The arguments presented in favor of such exceptions have not appealed to me strongly. To make any exception is to question the judgment and ability of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. This Congress should not do. I was not a Member of Congress when the act was passed creating the Interstate Commerce Commission; but since I have been a Member of this House I have voted for a number of acts largely increasing the power and jurisdiction of this great commission. I believe it has been an efficient and potential agency in the proper regulation and control of our great railways. I believe it has been a most valuable governmental instrument in the interest of the people. I would not vote to abolish it or curtail its power. Indeed, I would prefer to enlarge its authority, extend its power, increase its jurisdiction, and multiply its activities. But the Government has taken over our great railways. They are under the management of the Director General of Railways. Congress by the recent railway act relieved the commission of some of its important duties. The President now has the power to initiate railway rates. The commission may only on petition and hearing modify the rates fixed by the President.

The members of the Interstate Commerce Commission are recognized as able and experienced men. They are well equipped to discharge their duties. They have under them a large force of capable, highly trained employees. If the President, upon whom more than any other man rests the responsibility of winning the war, believes he can utilize the Interstate Commerce Commission or any of its employees to aid in winning this war, I am in favor of him using it. I shall vote to give him the power to do so. I would go further. I would vote to suspend all the activities of the Interstate Commerce Commission during the war if I thought that would hasten victory for our cause or lessen the sacrifices which our soldiers and sailors must make to win that victory.

I am not one who would do aught to hamper the Federal Trade Commission in its work. I have great confidence in this commission. If you will pardon a personal reference, I will state that I was the first in the House of Representatives to introduce a bill to create a Federal commission to regulate and control the great business corporations. I was the first Member in the House to make a speech advocating the establishing of such a commission. The bill was introduced in January, 1912, and the speech was made in February, 1912. This was before any political party in its national platform had proposed, indorsed, or mentioned such a measure. It was nearly three years before the bill was passed creating the Federal Trade Commission. I took great interest in that measure when it was under consideration. Naturally, I would not like to see the work of this great commission halted. Nevertheless, until our foe shall have been vanquished, until our brave troops shall have returned home waving the banner of victory, I am willing, if the President thinks it necessary, that the Federal Trade Commission shall be utilized solely in the work of subduing German autocracy.

There is probably not a single Member of this House who would vote to abolish the Federal Reserve Board. Only a comparatively few would be in favor of abolishing the Federal Farm Loan Board or the War Finance Corporation. The majority of both Houses of Congress have faith in all these great independent commissions. They regard them as permanent governmental agencies. They believe they will serve a highly useful purpose in the years to come. But when the life of the Nation is at stake, when our free institutions are in jeopardy, when all our personal rights and all our property interests are in danger, when we have nearly 2,000,000 men, comprising our bravest and best citizens, under arms confronting the enemy, ready, if need be, to make the supreme sacrifice for their country's sake, let us not waste time and energy and thought and effort in trying to protect any one or all of these commissions from a possible mistake of our President. If the Chief Executive should make a mistake in using the power given him in this bill it would be no killing thing. It could not seriously affect the public at large, because it would be only a temporary loss.

Mr. Speaker, it is seldom that any important matter of legislation comes before Congress that some one does not predict that dire calamities will follow. Generally these predictions do not come true. The most inefficient and dangerous Congress is one that does nothing through fear of evil consequences. The individual who is afraid to act and take the responsibility of his act seldom accomplishes anything worth while. So it is with nations. Our forefathers took a chance when they promulgated the Declaration of Independence. Lincoln took a chance when he declared himself unreservedly for the preservation of the Union. So Congress may well take a chance in trusting the President. So I say to President Wilson, here is the Interstate Commerce Commission, here is the Federal Reserve Board, here is the Federal Farm Loan Board, here is the War Finance Corporation, and here are all the other governmental commissions, bureaus, and agencies—trusting in your wisdom, trusting in your statesmanship, trusting in your patriotism—here are all these governmental agencies, take them and use them as weapons with which to whip Germany. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE], a member of the committee.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, there has been much criticism of the bill as one conferring tremendous powers on the President. It is said also that it confers legislative functions on the Executive. I feel that these criticisms are unwarranted. Many of the things that could be done under this bill the President now has power to do, and as for the rest, even if the authority asked in this bill did not exist, there is no question but that any changes which the President might deem necessary would be authorized by Congress in individual bills. It does not authorize the creation of additional agencies, so there is no merit in the contention that it confers legislative functions, since all the powers, duties, and offices affected have all been conferred, determined, and authorized by legislative enactment. Some one says, however, he might disturb the Government Printing Office, the Congressional Library, or the Interstate Commerce Commission. Well, we have given to the President the power to draft men of the Nation for military service. We have placed in his hands the control of the food, fuel, railroads, and ships of the country. Why hesitate to give him authority to use existing Government agencies, and powers in the way which will enable him to get the best results in administering the affairs of the Nation?

This war is one between groups of Nations, and the battles are to be won or lost not only in France and Flanders, but in the fields, mines, factories, and homes of the United States as well. We have learned that the most ardent supporters, prior to the war, of preparedness for the Nation, never suggested a program that even remotely approached the preparation which we have found it necessary to make since our entrance into the war. We see clearly that we must centralize and organize if we would bring our efficiency up to the point where the Nation will prove to be the determining factor in the war. What we do, however, must not only be done well, but must be done quickly. Under this bill, if the President believes that the transfer of duties, officers, or powers will promote the efficiency of the Government, he can act immediately. Why should it be necessary to refer each case to Congress for action when time is of vital importance and extended debate and discussion may not be helpful, to say the least? All through the war we have dreaded the cry "Too late"; we have been impatient because results were not more quickly achieved, and yet when this bill, which authorizes quick action is presented, the severest critics of the administration are not willing that the bill shall pass, but would have Congress debate and consider every change that this bill would permit.

Lloyd George, in his famous speech made shortly after the beginning of the present German drive, quoted the Kaiser as having said that the allies would be defeated because they lacked united command.

Allied soldiers and statesmen have at last become convinced that national pride and ambition, and the pride and ambition of individuals, must give way before the admitted need of the hour—a central commander for the allied military forces. This action, long delayed, seems now to be an accomplished fact. Opposing the organized central powers, we now have an organization of the military resources of the nations at war with them, united in purpose and command. Shall not we, the Congress of the United States, profit by this experience and decision? If unity of command and quick decision is necessary on the battle front in France and Flanders, is it not necessary that within our own country we should place in the hands of the President, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and the responsible head of the Nation, all the power and authority we can constitutionally grant, to bring us to that state of efficiency and organization which will make our resources and energies felt to the utmost in this struggle.

I shall support this measure, because it rightfully places and confirms in the hands of the President necessary powers to promote the efficiency of the Government in carrying on this war and to enable us to better meet emergencies as they arise. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee which reported this bill I desire to present briefly a few observations upon the measure. In the troublous times in which the Nation now finds itself we must see to it that our preparation for and participation in the great struggle is in no way handicapped or hampered by reason of any lack of power or by reason of any duplication of effort. The Chief Executive, as I understand the situation, has asked for this legislation or for legislation of a purport similar to that included within this measure. In my opinion the powers granted are extremely broad, and I have some doubt as to whether or not in their application we do not confer power and authority upon the Executive which was not contemplated by the Constitution and which perhaps may be in violation of its provisions. When we come to transfer, not the personnel, not the officials, but when we come to boldly grant by legislation the right to transfer the functions and authority of boards or departments, which are the creatures of the legislative branch, to individuals or to other boards or departments, that transfer to be brought about by the Executive, it seems to me that we are attempting to confer on the Executive legislative prerogatives, or at least investing him with the power to do what, in creating these boards and defining their functions and authority, was purely a legislative act.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman be kind enough to refer to what feature of the transfer would be unconstitutional, in his judgment?

Mr. WALSH. Well, for instance, under this bill the Executive could transfer the functions and authority of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Comptroller of the Currency. He could vest them in one man or in some separate department or in some specific individual. Now, it seems to me, inasmuch as the Interstate Commerce Commission was created by an act of Congress, for us to give the Executive the power to take over something that we have created and say to the Comptroller of the Currency, "These functions, duties, and powers I hereby vest in you"——

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Does not the gentleman answer his own objection when he states that the Interstate Commerce Commission is a creature of Congress? Can not the Congress lodge in some other person the powers that it at first granted to the commission?

Mr. WALSH. I think undoubtedly Congress could pass an act to transfer the functions, duties, and powers of any board or commission to anybody or any other board it saw fit. Congress could pass an act transferring those powers; but for us to grant that power to the Executive, it seems to me would be conferring legislative authority and functions upon the Executive. Congress certainly could repeal the laws creating all these commissions, but I doubt if we can say to the President, "You, sir, can, if you desire, repeal these laws or multiply them to such extent as you wish." It is, in my view, a question involving grave doubts as to its constitutionality.

But I will say to the gentleman from Louisiana that, inasmuch as the question is a doubtful one, and inasmuch as a number of my colleagues upon the committee, who are most distinguished as constitutional lawyers, have seen fit to give the measure the benefit of the doubt, I do not seek at this time to argue at any greater length the constitutional questions involved.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman receive my commendation in that respect, in regard to his course?

Mr. WALSH. Of course, and while I am very much pleased to have the gentleman's commendation, I assure him it would make no material difference whether I had it or not in making up my mind what to do in regard to this measure. But I assure him that I am deeply grateful to know here and now that my attitude on this important bill meets with his distinguished approbation.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the measure as framed should be amended. I think we ought not to put into the measure two or three of the administrative branches of the Government which might be included. I will enumerate those that I think ought to be excepted, and I trust that the House will see fit to amend the bill in that respect.

In the first place, we have recently by an act of Congress created what is known as the War Finance Corporation. That is a recent piece of legislation that has been passed during this session of Congress but a few weeks ago. We conferred upon it vast powers and grave responsibilities. It is so recent a creation that it would seem more proper that we should not now say, after having set up this machinery to control the industrial activities and render financial assistance to those activities in preparing for and carrying on our war program, "All your authority, duties, and functions may by a single stroke of the pen be transferred to one individual or to some other tribunal or board."

The same reason, I think, would apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission. We have recently in this House preserved in large measure the rights and the duties of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the amendment which was included in the Railroad Administration bill, in effect preserving its functions as to the rate-making power. Now, having passed upon that question so recently, I submit we ought not to permit the functions of that commission to be transferred to any individual and that power to be divested.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. MORGAN. I am very much interested in the address that the gentleman is making. I serve with him on the Committee on the Judiciary, and I have learned to appreciate his industry and his judgment upon legal matters, as well as his sincerity in all the positions that he has taken. I understand that the suggestions he is making now are really what he thinks will make for the improvement of the measure. But is his objection to placing within this bill the War Finance Corporation based upon the theory that he thinks the President might make a mistake and do the wrong thing and that he might abuse this power and that he can not be trusted? Is that the gentleman's ground?

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Speaker, in reply to my distinguished colleague from Oklahoma, I think the President is just as likely to make a mistake as any Member of Congress. Not a great many days ago we had read to us a very interesting communication which was signed by the Executive, in which he said practically that he had made a mistake in sending to us formerly and formally by means of a letter views which he had upon a certain measure.

Mr. MORGAN. Pardon me just a moment. Does not the gentleman think that is really a recommendation of the President; that he is willing to change his mind and admit that he has made a mistake?

Mr. WALSH. I say that we know he is likely to make a mistake and he is courageous to acknowledge it. But here is a serious situation, and I do not believe that Congress, having created this tremendous corporation with its vast powers and responsibilities, should say within two months practically after that measure becomes a law, "Mr. President, we might have been mistaken in passing that measure, and if you want to capsize it, if you want to distribute its functions and confer its responsibilities upon certain individuals, you are at liberty to do so." There is a further reason which applies to these boards or commissions which I think ought to be borne in mind: They are not wholly executive departments of the Government.

Mr. FESS. Before the gentleman leaves that will he yield to a question?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. FESS. Section 2, line 21, authorizes the President to utilize the commissions. Under that power I would like to ask the gentleman's opinion. Could the President use the Interstate Commerce Commission by utilizing the power we granted to the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rates? Could he so interpret this law that he could fix the rates on the railroads?

Mr. WALSH. I think practically he could, under a fair interpretation of that language.

Mr. FESS. The reason I ask is we had a very specific, discriminatory discussion on that very particular point in Congress and decided one way as against the other. Now, my idea is, Is it possible under the law here to do what Congress refused to allow to be done?

Mr. WALSH. The President under this act that was passed could, I think, directly do that; but he certainly could indirectly divest the Interstate Commerce Commission of its rate-making power and transfer it to some subordinate official or some other department of the Government, and thereby have the rates made that might meet with his approval, which rates might even have been disapproved of by the commission. For instance, he could say to the Director General of Railroads, "I transfer to you, the Secretary of the Treasury and Director General of the Railroads, the power to make rates and regulations respecting the railroads and divest the Interstate Commerce Commission of that power."

Mr. FESS. I think, if the gentleman will permit, that that is very clear in this provision. The question with me was whether under this law we are giving the power indirectly to the President to do precisely what we formerly refused to do?

Mr. WALSH. I believe the gentleman is correct in that, and that he could utilize the commission for that purpose as he suggests.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SWITZER. Has not the President the power, under the railroad bill that we passed, practically to fix the rates?

Mr. WALSH. No. I think the amendment that was adopted still leaves that authority with the Interstate Commerce Commission to a certain extent.

Mr. SWITZER. They can merely appeal from the decision, but nobody can enforce anything over his decision, can they?

Mr. WALSH. I think so.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. I want to assure the gentleman that under the railroad bill the President may call upon the Interstate Commerce Commission for advice and assistance and cooperation, and then further there is this blanket authority. He may also call upon any department or commission or board of the Government for such service as he may deem expedient.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly. That is one of the arguments I intended to advance a little later as to why this power should not be given.

Mr. IGOE. But under the railroad-control bill he can do it only as to the powers granted in that bill; but under this act he might, for instance, transfer the food control to some other department of the Government.

Mr. WALSH. That is just the point I was attempting to make. Perhaps I did not make myself clear to my colleague on the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE]. The railroad bill gave the President authority to call upon the Interstate Commerce Commission for assistance and information. He has that power now. I also believe that if the President desires he can under existing law make this sort of a transfer: If there is in the Interstate Commerce Commission a chief examiner, I believe that by an Executive order he can say to this chief examiner in the Interstate Commerce Commission, "You are transferred from the Interstate Commerce Commission and are made chief examiner in the Civil Service Commission under the civil-service statute." But that is a different thing than saying to the Interstate Commerce Commission, "Although the statute creating you gave you certain authority, certain duties, and certain functions, we will take those away from you as the Interstate Commerce Commission, and will confer them upon the Secretary of the Treasury," or upon the Assistant Secretary of Agriculture.

There is a further point which, I think, should be borne in mind in connection with this proposed legislation: That these departments of which I have spoken are not purely executive departments of the Government. They are departments that have been created and set up by Congress. They have certain administrative functions, and at least two of them—the Federal Reserve Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission—have semijudicial functions to perform. They hold hearings and hand down decrees or orders; and, in fact, in many of the statutes, and in construing some of the appropriation bills, they are considered as independent Government establishments.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the gentleman take the position that Congress can not confer judicial or semijudicial power upon an executive body?

Mr. WALSH. There is a difference between judicial power and semijudicial power, just as there is a difference between creating a court and creating a board which may hold a hearing and make a finding. Of course, the gentleman is too keen a lawyer not to appreciate that distinction.

Mr. MORGAN. I know the gentleman is familiar with the Constitution, and he recognizes that there are three kinds of power—legislative, judicial, and executive. There is no such thing as administrative power in the National Government. Administrative power can not be anything unless it is under executive power. There is no such thing as administrative power in the Federal Government, because there are only three powers.

Mr. WALSH. I agree with the gentleman that there are only three classes comprehended within the Constitution, but I will not admit that we do not have boards and tribunals which have been created by Congress that to a certain extent are vested with quasi judicial functions. For instance, the Interstate Commerce Commission is an administrative board and an independent establishment of the Government. It holds hearings upon rate questions and upon other matters and makes findings. Now, while it is not a court, it is not an executive body.

Mr. MORGAN. To be in harmony with the Constitution, must we not regard these semijudicial bodies, as the gentleman calls them, as inferior courts?

Mr. WALSH. No; we can not regard them as inferior courts, because we run up against the gentleman's friend the Constitution in another respect, if you regard them as inferior courts, since their term of office is fixed. If they were a court, we could not limit their term of office.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit, in the debate in both the Senate and House on the rate-fixing function that was given to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the lawyers of both Houses pointed out that that was judicial, and questioned whether it would be constitutional or not, establishing clearly that there is a judicial function outside of the Supreme Court.

Mr. WALSH. I think it is pretty clearly agreed that that is true. It has come to be recognized in these later days. It is a judicial function exercised by an independent administrative board.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I should like five minutes more.

Mr. MORGAN. I hope the gentleman from Minnesota will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts the five minutes which I failed to use.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the gentleman. Now, Mr. Speaker, further in connection with what I have said with reference to the purposes of the bill. Since this Congress declared war, in April, 1917, we have embarked upon a program of legislation which has not only evoked the admiration of the world, but it has been the wonderment of even Members of the legislative branch. Scarcely an act passes this Congress without conferring additional powers and duties. We all appreciate that in order to wage the war successfully the Commander in Chief of our forces must not be hampered, and he must not lack any power and authority to get results, and if he and his advisers feel that effort is being wasted, or that he lacks the authority and power to accomplish results owing to legislative restrictions hitherto imposed, then I say the Congress should see to it that the restrictions are removed.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Why is not some provision made in this bill for the President to report to Congress such transactions as occur under the authority herein granted?

Mr. WALSH. The reason is that the appropriations that are made for these various departments will continue to remain available, and while the transfers may be made, they are only for and during the continuance of the war. If in making the transfers the Executive should hit upon a plan which he felt ought to be made permenent, he is required under section 5 to report his conclusions to Congress with his recommendations. Now, I have no doubt that in readjusting certain of the bureaus, commissions, or boards he will ascertain coordinations that ought to be made permanent, but before they can be made permanent he is required to report to the Congress with his recommendations. Certainly there are many boards or bureaus that could be dispensed with during this war, and their personnel transferred to more essential work.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is only as to offices that may be abolished.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; abolished or transferred, in whole or in part.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I was inquiring with reference to such a consolidation as that of placing the Interstate Commerce Commission under the Director General of Railroads, or such a case as I referred to in my question to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], the placing of the Mining Bureau under the Food Administration.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think there is anything that requires him to report to Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think that Congress ought to maintain its status to that extent?

Mr. WALSH. I have grave doubts as to whether that is of very much importance. Of course, the President in the War and Navy Departments can make transfers of heads of bureaus or officials of the line without reporting to Congress, and I assume that when this is done it will be done by Executive order, of which we will have notice.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is provided in section 1 that he shall make regulations and orders in writing to the heads of departments, and that the regulations and orders shall constitute a public record. But that means only that newspapers may have access to the records, if they want to, and if they do not Congress is not informed.

Mr. WALSH. I suppose in case one bureau was transferred or abolished, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania had some business with it and attempted to transact it, he would soon find out that it had been either abolished or transferred.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is true, as far as the individual is concerned, but I would think it well to maintain the right of Congress to know what business is transacted even by the President of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. The jurisdiction and rights the gentleman seeks to have preserved are of so little consequence if this measure becomes a law, Congress having released its right to legislate, as far as this measure is concerned, it would not do much good to mourn or grieve over what loss it may sustain in that respect.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Surely, if the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission were placed under the Director General of Railroads, and he was given the power to fix rates, Congress should be informed of it.

Mr. WALSH. That might be of sufficient importance for an amendment.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I shall support the measure, but I shall offer an amendment to exempt the Interstate Commerce Commission, and shall also favor propositions which I understand will be offered to exempt the War Finance Corporation and the Federal Reserve Board. I do not believe if these amendments are adopted that we are in any way hampering the power which it is necessary for the President to have to properly direct the war to the victory which we know awaits us. But, Mr. Speaker, I see that my time has about expired, and I ask leave to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. VENABLE). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was first proposed I had not fully comprehended all that was intended to be done, and was impressed that it was some sort of a revolutionary movement in the disturbance of the coordinate relations of the three departments of the Government. Upon that impression I was very much averse to a favorable consideration of it. I have probably unfortunately lived considerable of my mental life in the study of political science, and am therefore likely to resist any change by legislation that might fundamentally change the organic features of our Government. One of the characteristc features of our form of government that contradistinguishes it from all other governments is the nice relationship between the three coordinate departments—and we use the word "coordinate" advisedly, because each is equal to the other.

In the Sixty-third Congress I felt that the executive was extending its functions over the legislative, as an expression of the present President's political theory of the superior influence of that department. I addressed myself to that subject for an hour in this House, calling attention of the Members to the trend toward initiation of legislation by the Executive, making him a legislator rather than an administrator. I provoked considerable adverse criticism from Members on the Democratic side of the House, who seemed to more or less resent my suggestion that the executive was extending its functions over the legislative. I at that time urged that legislation was a matter of Congress and administration of the Executive.

I am just as zealous to-day that each department be inherently permitted to go on with its constitutional functions and not be interfering with the other, as I was then. I read in that discussion from the present President's series of lectures delivered in 1908 in the University of Columbia. Among his utterances was this remarkable statement:

> The personal force of the President is perfectly constitutional to any extent to which he chooses to exercise it.

That is, in substance. The President is limited in the exercise of his legitimate functions only by his ability. He should make himself as strong as his ability will permit. Further on, he said:

> The law-making part of the Government should be very hospitable to the suggestions of the planning and the acting part of the Government.

I criticized those statements. I know that we are in the cycle of thinking to-day, where if the Executive or anyone else should lash the legislative branch, the Congress, as it has been shown many times during the past few years, it would be rather popular in the country. That is largely due to the indiscriminate and irresponsible criticism of Congress by the press, especially that part of it that has no regard for either the truth of the statements or the results of misrepresentation and other agencies. They are themselves making appeal to the sensation monger, and too frequently assisted by irresponsibles in high place for just such opposition and such bitter attacks upon Congress. It has long been the fashion for Congress to be used as the scapegoat for the shortcomings of others. If the public thinks the Congress derelict, anything the Executive might demand from Congress would probably be applauded by the public.

That is why I discussed that question before there was any question of war and warned the Members against the dangers of loss of prestige through indiscriminate criticism of the penny-a-liner and the sensation monger. But we are now in war. We must depend for efficiency upon, first, undivided responsibility, and, second, quickness of decision. War demands concentration of power in direction, and that necessitates undivided responsibility. Therefore we must not withhold any necessary power, as I see it, from the President that would seek to demand efficient service in the prosecution of the war, and especially quickness of decision when it is necessary.

For that reason I have voted for measures that are bewildering, and so have you. We have put the entire production of the country under the head of one man because we are in war. We have given over into his hands the power of regulating our everyday food requirements. We have passed over into the hands of one person powers scarcely limited on the food question. We have seen in the exercise of that power a total disarrangement of industry, much of it greatly disquieting. We have passed over into the hands of another man the fuel situation, and nobody would think of doing it if we were not in a crisis. Under the exercise of this dictator we have noticed a total paralysis of the country's business. It was apparent that much of the suffering was due to a failure to grasp the situation, yet no one contends that the power should not be lodged somewhere.

We have passed over into the hands of one man the control of transportation, comprehending an industry of $20,000,000,000 and an articulate force of nearly 20,000,000 people, or a fifth of our population. I am simply bewildered when I think of the power that man has to-day, and what it will mean if he chooses to abuse it for any ulterior purpose, yet we did it by our vote, with our eyes wide open to what we did and the possible consequences. Yet in the face of this war I think if we had to consider it over again we would do the same thing. We have passed over into the control of the Attorney General's office under the espionage act pretty nearly the freedom of speech for the protection of the country. All of us hesitated. For one of the principles for which mankind has fought and died is to secure this freedom. The chapter of history that records that struggle is our brightest. We have given in a semiofficial way—at least the President has found a way to make this officer his official censor—the power to give out information and to withhold information, pretty nearly determining what the press shall carry in its columns, judged from the material that it prints. Some time ago we passed into the hands of a capital commission power or ability to say whether any industrial organizations shall issue bonds to improve the community or to establish an industry, which virtually controls public as well as private expenditure in every community in the Nation, and when I think of the power that committee has over the funds of the country it is bewildering. Had any citizen ever suggested that the time would come in this democracy where such surrender of the citizens' rights would be done he would have been called hard names. Yet we did it with our eyes wide open. These are but a few of the powers passed over to the President in the last year.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I will yield to my friend.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it not the opinion of the gentleman from Ohio that the powers conferred upon the Executive by the acts to which he has referred are much more vital and tremendous than are the powers sought to be conferred by this bill?

Mr. FESS. In a careful reading of the bill which I have made, having read it and reread it several times, I do not believe that we are passing over power in this bill that is equal in any way to what we have already done. We have given the President commandeering power of private wealth in a certain degree. However, I think that in this bill we are doing some things that are unnecessary, and I shall vote for two amendments if they shall be offered. I sincerely urge the House to accept these proposals to omit certain institutions.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman will recall that the bill creating the War Finance Corporation, as originally brought to this House, left the functions both of the loaning of money and of supervising securities in the hands of one committee?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I recall it distinctly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The House, however, deliberately separated those functions, and gave to one particular committee the power of loaning money and to another committee the power of supervising securities.

Mr. FESS. Yes; and I think wisely so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Under this bill the President might coordinate those powers back into one committee.

Mr. FESS. I think that is possible, although I had overlooked that. I had called attention, however, in another place, when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was on the floor, where the decree of the House on the railway bill could be made inoperative by this measure.

Mr. GARNER. What will be the material difference if that power should be placed in the hands of one committee?

Mr. FESS. We had some objections to it when it was up as a matter of discussion, thinking it would be better because the two functions were totally different.

Mr. GARNER. I recall that I was one of those who objected, and who thought it ought to be in two different hands; but, essentially, what is the difference between five men controlling the entire outfit or two separate committees?

Mr. GORDON. Both being appointed by the President.

Mr. GARNER. There is an amendment to be offered to this bill excepting two departments of the Government from the operation of it; and I would like the gentleman from Ohio, whose judgment I value very much, to discuss those features if he has the time. One activity of the Government to be excepted is the Federal Reserve System and the other is the Interstate Commerce Commission; and in that connection I want to ask the gentleman, if the House should decide to except those two branches of Government from the effects of this bill would it not be tantamount to saying to the President that with all other branches of the Government he can do as he pleases?

Mr. FESS. I would say to my friend from Texas, in connection with that, that the two institutions that have been created by Congress that are somewhat intermediary—in a sense, administrative, having also the element of the judicial, the Federal Reserve Board, and the Interstate Commerce Commission—I would hesitate to include within the powers of this bill, for they are functions that I do not think should be exercised by the Executive. It is true they are not legislative but, rather, administrative, but so apart as separate institutions that no Executive order should be allowed to change them. I would much prefer to omit from the operations of this bill the Federal Reserve Board and the Interstate Commerce Commission. The financial question, in my mind, is probably one of the most sensitive. It does not appeal to so many people as directly affecting their pocketbooks, as does the Interstate Commerce Commission, because it is a principle rather than a commodity; and the financial situation is such that I have always been afraid that we might go to a fiat basis in our circulating medium. I have always been afraid of the soft-money commotion that is being displayed in the demands now for the expansion of credits.

Mr. GARNER. I agree with the gentleman in reference to the timidity of money, but I again call his attention to the fact that if you exempt these two activities of the Government, you virtually say to the President, these are the only two that Congress wants to jealously guard from your interference, whereas I believe that if you leave the bill as it is the President would not dare—I use that word advisedly—interfere with those two functions of the Government to which I have just referred.

Mr. FESS. I would say to my friend that it has been currently stated that, although the bill covers those two organizations, it is not thought that the President will exercise power over them. Indeed, we have been assured that such a thing is not in his mind. I have heard that said. But I do not see why it is any reflection upon the Executive for us to except those two particular institutions, and perhaps also the Finance Corporation, a recently created Government institution.

Mr. GARNER. Under the well-known rule, if you except two, by making those two exceptions you say to the President, for all other purposes you can do as you please, and nobody can anticipate that the President will disturb all the other functions of the Government.

Mr. FESS. I can see that possibility. But I certainly see no unwisdom in thus protecting Government agencies we do not expect to disturb.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I yield to my friend from New York.

Mr. PLATT. Is there any authority granted in this bill to the President to abolish anything?

Mr. FESS. He can abolish by recommending the abolition to the Congress, and Congress, of course, must act before the abolition takes place, which makes Congress the abolition body in the final analysis. But in section 2 he is authorized to so transfer or suspend the function of any bureau, which I think is tantamount to the abolition of it. However, the chairman of the committee and members of the committee say that that abolition would have to be temporary—a mere suspension of the operations of the bureau for a period of time. They insist that this simply suspends the operation during the war, and the suspended bureaus would be reinstated at the close of the war. I am not entirely convinced of the correctness of that statement.

Mr. PLATT. It seems we ought to strengthen some of these things so as to encourage the President to abolish some of the bureaus, boards, and commissions absolutely for the time being at least. There are too many of them.

Mr. FESS. The sentiment which the gentleman from New York has just now expressed is one of the things that will induce me without much relutance to vote for the bill, especially if certain amendments can be made. I do think there is duplication and reduplication.

Mr. PLATT. There is no question of that.

Mr. FESS. I think there is an immense amount of lost motion. I know that we are not getting the maximum of efficiency out of the departments simply because of a lack of coordination which permits of undue duplication of the various departments. That has been one of the sources of criticism by those of us who have studied into the mechanism of our Government, and is really one of the strongest arguments for the adoption of the budget system, if we could some way or other hit upon a legitimate plan for a budget system, in order to save lost motion and waste of money and energy. That approaches only to the financial, and when we come to the service element, to get the largest results of efficient service out of the money we are expending through these agencies we ought to give the power somewhere to eliminate a great deal of the deadwood and to bring out a better coordination.

Mr. PLATT. I agree with the gentleman absolutely, and I think also that a great deal of the work that is being done in the way of manufacturing great volumes of different statistics might as well be stopped. At the present time we have learned all we can from those statistics and there is no use of continuing them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield me more time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. FESS. I thank the gentleman; he looked pleasant enough to give it to me. The query propounded by the gentleman from New York about the multiplicity of our statistics is quite pertinent. I think that has come to be a joke. Every desk in the House Office Building is flooded with material that is positively fit for nothing save the waste basket. In conversation with a Senator recently who was checking up this very matter I was astonished at his figures which point to this very item of waste. It has gotten to be such a joke that I doubt very much whether very many of our Members read the merest portion of it. Some of it good, no doubt of that; but the truth is it is so profuse, as well as prolix, if not wholly useless, that you do not have the time to discriminate the good from the bad, and most of it goes to the scrap heap. If you undertake to sift it, how much time would you have for anything else? I think that the energies of our Government in the administrative features can be put to a good deal better purpose than simply this publicity business that induces departments to send out representatives to Congressmen's offices and ask them, for example, as I was asked recently, whether they observe the food regulations and all such tommyrot as that. I do not think it is creditable to any body or bureau to have such things as that done. [Applause.]

Mr. PLATT. Does not the gentleman think the Interstate Commerce Commission does rather more than its share in getting out useless statistics, statistics which are useless at this time?

Mr. FESS. Well, I could not speak definitely of that particular organization, because it so occurs that I have not had connection with it so much as I have with some other departments. I think the Agricultural Department here, while it is doing an immense amount of good in publications, especially in instructing the public on the latest in production and caring for products, a great many statistics are being sent out under its management which are not of value. The marketing feature, for example, has become very profuse in its publicity department, much of which I doubt whether it pays for the paper it is put on.

Mr. PLATT. The Interstate Commerce Commission is still asking for more and more statistics from the railroads as to whether the conductors wear No. 9 shoes or No. 7 shoes, and whether they cut their toenails three times a week or only once a week, and a whole mass of stuff for which there is absolutely no use.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I have been one of the Members of the House who have fretted considerably over what seemed to be a useless tardiness in our equipment for war. We are now in the fourteenth month of war, and in some phases of it the situation is not reassuring. I realize how difficult it is to come from nothing to everything. I know how tremendous—I do not know, but I have some notion—what a tremendous problem it is to place the Nation in arms to meet the foe we must face. I do not discount the task. I had an interview very recently with a committee that knows the situation in some of the war work. The interview was sought by me to get at the core of the situation. That committee said that very largely our ineffectiveness in that particular department which is getting so much publicity just now is due, in their judgment, to the fact that we failed in our organization to secure the maximum ability of the country. It appeared we did not have the ability to use what ability we have. That is, the fault is not a lack of ability so much as failure to effect an organization to utilize what we had. That is, they are in one another's way. There is no coordination. This is very apparent to any observer. We have the raw material, the money, and the brains, but lack the management to use what we have. I know the administration is trying to cure this palpable mistake. It at last is accepting leaders, and the entire country applauds that fact, as was displayed when we found Gen. Goethals put at the head of one of the great departments. The whole country immediately felt a confidence and settled down at once in the belief that the maximum result now would be realized, because a builder had taken the place of a mere officer. When Stettinius was given a position which demanded a genius who had proved his work, while I did not know anything about his ability, yet I read in the press everywhere that we would have better results, and everyone readily sensed the confident air which settled on the public mind. Mr. Speaker, no appointment since the war began gave such relief to the country as that of head of shipbuilding. I am absolutely certain that the appointment of Charley Schwab at the head of the shipbuilding movement was regarded Nation-wide as the best thing that could have been done at this hour, when the one need is ships, and yet more ships. The country knows Schwab. It knows him as the genius in building that knows the game from bottom to top. It has settled down to the belief that if ships can be built they will certainly be built. The latest appointment, that of Mr. Ryan, has given further confidence. I do not know anything about him except his reputation, but when he was placed at the head of the aeronautic work the country felt at once that now we will utilize the ability we have in this field of war activity.

Mr. Speaker, on the aircraft situation I have been in sympathy with those who insist we must have better results than are now apparent. If lack of power is the cause, as some pretend to assert, I can not withhold voting the President greater power, when convinced he believes the lack of it cripples efficiency. I will vote him power to coordinate when he says he needs it, and at the same time I am thereby taking the steps necessary to hold him responsible for what is not done where he has the power to do it. I am going, therefore, to vote him this power he has asked Congress to give him, and then we will hold him responsible for what is not done as well as for what is done. In an hour like this, with the inefficient situation complained of, I can not withhold my vote from this measure. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD], a member of the committee.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I should support what I deem to be the purpose of this measure in time of peace. I shall support its present expression in time of war. I make the distinction because I think one part of the bill will have a good effect; at least, I hope it will have a good effect when war's horrors shall have passed. That is in reference to the number of bureaus, commissions, and governing bodies which our body politic at this time has for the performance of its official business. We have bureaus for this, we have bureaus for that, we have bureaus and commissions galore, and we have been drifting, not unconsciously, but we have been drifting consciously into a position, it seems to me, where we are asking, where we are seeking the General Government to assume the duty of the individual, the community, and the State, because it has always been easy to say in either branch of the Congress of the United States that here is this great United States of ours, something is wanted by this man or this community or this State; let the United States from its vastly superior revenues do the work.

I think that this bill, with the suggested powers it has, of the abolishment of the unnecessary commissions and bureaus, may perform a very useful public service. In this connection, too, I give my individual expression toward the installation of a regularly appointed system for the proper expenditure of our public money. A budget system or some such system as will take into consideration the proper expenditure of our public moneys is one of the things of possible recommendation within this bill. And I am indeed hopeful that when the President of the United States has considered, as of course he will consider, whether any of these bureaus should be abolished, whether upon final consideration it be found that their usefulness no longer exists, then we may have in this Congress a report which will enable us to do that which I think should have been done long ago, and that is to place our financial system of appropriation upon a definite, a distinct, and a proper basis.

Now we come to consider the bill. I said I would support it in time of peace. I support it in time of war because it is highly necessary, I think, that absolutely every department of the United States be placed in a position of responsibility to its utmost endeavors. I favor this law, which will apply the maximum of effort of every department toward the one great task we have in hand and that is the winning of this war. And I think it is that which is expressed in this bill. And I desire briefly to comment upon the bill from a legal standpoint as I see it.

The bill provides for a redistribution of functions among executive agencies Now, the gist of the whole bill, Members of the House, is that, namely, the redistribution of functions among executive agencies. In the Century Dictionary the word "redistribution" is said to mean "a dealing back; a second or new distribution." I take it that each of us wishes to intelligently formulate in his mind and to give expression thereto by his vote his opinion as to the meaning of this bill, so that he understandingly may vote either for it or against it. And I desire to give you my observations of what this bill means.

I do not think this bill confers a single power of creation upon the Executive. I am of those who believe that the safety of our institutions demands the separation of our governing departments into the executive, the legislative, and judicial. And I think that to endure as we have endured, a Nation of peace, seeking to promote peace, it is essential that the integrity of the Executive, the legislative, and the judiciary be always preserved. In this bill, as I read it, we have an assembling for the redistribution of functions among executive agencies. Now, when we say that what do we mean? Do we mean that something new, unexplored, vast, unknown is given to the President of the United States? Not so. I say it simply means that to the President, to the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, is given the power of distribution and redistribution of executive and administrative agencies for the purpose of obtaining the maximum of efficient service.

When we say "redistribution," which is, of course, another way of affirming a distribution, we can not imply the creation of any new body. It seems to me absolutely illogical that anyone here or elsewhere assumes that from the words of this bill are created new offices by the President of the United States.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. GARD. Surely.

Mr. GILLETT. Does not the gentleman think that under this bill the President could take away certain duties from an official who by law is given certain duties, and who has to be confirmed by the Senate, and give them to an official who is not confirmed by the Senate, and thereby change our Government and practically nullify the power of confirmation by the Senate?

Mr. GARD. I do not know the particular instance to which the gentleman refers. Will he kindly specify?

Mr. GILLETT. For instance, could he not take away from the head of the Department of Justice, from the Attorney General, his duties, and give them to Mr. Baruch, for instance? I do not know just what his title is.

Mr. GARD. I would not think so, unless it be an executive or administrative function.

Mr. GILLETT. Why not?

Mr. GARD. My idea, I am frank to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, whose judgment I very much admire and respect, is that it contains in its language a limitation of redistribution, that there is nothing in the procedure which would be held to increase any existing powers, but that if there be a power, for instance, vested in the Attorney General as the head of the Department of Justice, and for a war purpose, the President of the United States, by proclamation, could say that that power, already vested—no new power—shall be exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury or any other Cabinet officer.

Mr. GILLETT. Or any other executive agency?

Mr. GARD. Or any other executive agency. I go that far. It seems to me that that is absolutely not creating any new power; it is not making any change in recognition of the divisions—legislative, executive, and judicial. It is simply the proper assembling of power.

Now, the bill has been assailed——

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman has referred to the fact that the chief part of this bill is authorizing the distribution of executive power.

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. Now, then, in section 2 of the bill it refers not only to executive powers, but it says, "Any executive or administrative commission, bureau, agency, and so forth."

Does the gentleman make any distinction between the executive power and administrative power; and if so, what is the distinction?

Mr. GARD. Oh, the words "executive" and "administrative," I assume, in this instance, are held to be almost entirely synonymous, since the first section, which is the power-carrying section, relates to executive agencies. To say in the second section that it relates to executive or administrative commissions is to me saying quite the same thing.

Mr. MORGAN. Does not the gentleman think that the "administrative" must be subsidiary or a part included under "executive"?

Mr. GARD. I do. Of course, the executive is first. The administration is that which acts under the executive power.

When I paused to answer a question a moment ago I was proceeding to discuss objections which I had heard against this bill, they being in effect two in number. One is that the bill is unconstitutional as proposed, because of a delegation of executive power. Now, I do not think the bill carries in a single line of it the delegation of legislative power. It merely provides for a distribution of executive powers, no delegation of legislative powers.

Of course, we are all familiar with the decisions of the Supreme Court, which have recognized that in the upbuilding of this great country of ours it becomes necessary for certain work to be done by bodies having immediate supervision of the same. Therefore the distinction is recognized that while we may not confer legislative authority, still we may confer authority which, under a given state of affairs or conditions, may be exercised. We have this in the commission known as the Interstate Commerce Commission, which, in some degree at least, possesses judicial functions, and in other commissions or departments of the Government we have that particular thing.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. GARD. Very gladly.

Mr. TOWNER. I entirely agree with the gentleman that there is no creation of legislative powers under the operation of this bill, but there is a transference of legislative powers, as I think the gentleman will agree with me. For instance, the Supreme Court held, in supporting the rate-making power in the Interstate Commerce Commission, that while that power of making rates was a legislative power, it might be and should be properly delegated to the commission acting for the purpose of doing that administratively and acting under the authority of the legislative power. Now, under the provisions of this bill, that legislative power of making rates, which is now vested in the Interstate Commerce Commission, may be transferred by the President to the Director of Railroads by his order, so that that would be a transference of legislative power under the provisions of this bill, as I think the gentleman will agree.

Mr. GARD. I am very happy to give the gentleman and other Members of the House my own idea as to what the gentleman refers to.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not myself question the transference by Congress of that exercise of power. I think the Congress has the right to say to what body it shall be transferred.

Mr. GARD. Undoubtedly the Congress which created a commission has the right to say whether any other person or any other commission shall exercise its authority. That is entirely constitutional. It is my opinion that the Congress, having conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission the rate-fixing power and having most recently, at the time the control of the railroads was transferred to the Director General of Railroads, still contained in that legislative transfer an adherence to the right of the Interstate Commerce Commission to review railroad rates. Under this bill the power of determining rates must remain where it is, as this Congress has put it, in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that the bill does not contain in any provision any authority to create a new board appointed from any outside source to do the work which the Interstate Commerce Commission has been by this Congress legally made potent to do.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Is it the gentleman's contention, then, that the President, under the provisions of this bill, could not transfer the rate-making functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the Director General of Railroads?

Mr. GARD. It is my contention that that is true.

Mr. GILLETT. Is the gentleman going to explain why that is true?

Mr. GARD. I thought I had done so, but I will try again.

Mr. GILLETT. I confess I did not understand that the gentleman had done so.

Mr. GARD. The expression I sought to convey was this, that the Congress of the United States, having said that to the Director General of Railroads is delegated the management of railroads, giving him the right to initiate rates and having retained, as it has, the power in the Interstate Commerce Commission to review the rates, that is a power that can not be disturbed until this Congress by its act affirmatively transfers the rate-reviewing power to somebody else. I say this Congress can do it, but not under this bill nor by any other authority can the Executive do it.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman can go ahead.

Mr. GARD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNER. I want to make this suggestion to the gentleman: The gentleman says that Congress can do it. When we pass this bill, will not Congress do it? That is the proposition. For instance, let me ask the gentleman this: Supposing that when we passed the other act we had said that that shall be the body that shall exercise the power until the President by executive order transferred it to some other department or independent commission of the Government, would not the gentleman hold then that the President could transfer it? And are we not doing now just what we would have been doing then if that amendment had been adopted? Are we not now saying that we will amend that law and modify it, so that instead of leaving with the Interstate Commerce Commission the function of fixing rates, we give the President the power to transfer that function to whatever other body he desires to transfer it to?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, the President told me that I could tell the House that he had no notion of ever doing what has been referred to.

Mr. GILLETT. That makes no difference, whether he intends to or not. The question is, Are we giving him the power?

Mr. GARD. Yes; we are discussing the question of power.

Mr. GILLETT. Has the gentleman considered the line at the top of page 2, "including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon any executive department"? The power of the Interstate Commerce Commission was a power conferred by our law, and this gives him the right to transfer that power. Considering that, how does the gentleman except the Interstate Commerce Commission from that provision?

Mr. GARD. I do not make any exception of the Interstate Commerce Commission or any other commission.

Mr. GILLETT. I understood the gentleman to say that he thought this law did not allow the rate-fixing power to be taken away from the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. GARD. My contention is that there is and should be no exception of the Interstate Commerce Commission, or the Federal Trade Commission, or any other of the so-called commissions, because I say that this bill merely gives the power to the President to assemble their executive and administrative powers and duties for a proper distribution. But where Congress has said affirmatively that a right shall exist, that right must endure. If the gentleman will pardon me, there is a distinction between the interdepartmental exchange of activities and rights vested by law. With the interdepartmental exchange of activities I assume that everyone here is in accord, since that is a matter which is a proper and necessary adjustment of present utilities—things which have been conferred by this Congress upon certain bureaus and commissions and persons.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 10 minutes more, regardless of the time fixed for general debate.

Mr. GARD. If the gentleman makes that request, I ask that he limit it to five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will make it 10 minutes. I think the House wishes to hear the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] be extended 10 minutes, regardless of the time fixed for general debate. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object to that. The gentlemen in charge of the time have plenty of time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Neither gentleman has time. The time is more than taken.

Mr. MADDEN. If that is so, I do not object.

Mr. GARD. I do not desire to take the time of the House unduly, but merely wished to afford my explanation.

Mr. MADDEN. I objected only on condition that there was time that could be yielded.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will take the 10 minutes. This is a most interesting discussion of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There being no objection, the gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman regard the Interstate Commerce Commission, established by act of Congress, as an executive agency? Would it not be immune from the provisions of this bill, under its language?

Mr. GILLETT. It says—

> including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, in such manner as in his judgment shall seem best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act.

It certainly would be covered under one of these expressions.

Mr. GARD. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and the interpolation of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], I will say that I think the bill is sufficiently broad to give the President of the United States, if he deems it necessary, the right to ask and have the assistance and cooperation of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy. But if the gentleman will kindly permit, I desire to return to the point of a moment ago, because some may contend, and perhaps rightfully contend, that there is a distinction between the interdepartmental exchange of activities and the creation of a new right which affects something vested by law. I confess I think there is such a distinction and difference.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me just there?

Mr. GARD. Surely.

Mr. CANNON. The Director of Railways, as I understand, has increased the pay of railway employees about $300,000,000. Has not the Interstate Commerce Commission heretofore been doing that work?

Mr. GARD. I confess that I am unable to fully answer that question.

Mr. MADDEN. That has not been done by the Interstate Commerce Commission, but by the Wage Board, which the President of the United States appointed to consider the question of a raise of wages.

Mr. ROBBINS. They have made the recommendation.

Mr. MADDEN. They have made the recommendation, and the Director General of Railroads has carried out the recommendation.

Mr. CANNON. As commissions are expressly referred to in this bill, does the gentleman claim that the President can not have the power to designate somebody else, if he sees proper, to increase freight rates, for instance, as somebody else has been designated to increase the wages of employees?

Mr. GARD. I do contend that the President has no power to designate some other person to do that which the Congress necessarily must do; that if there be a change in designation over and above anything vested by law, in so far as the relations of a judicial or a legislative interpretation is concerned, apart from a mere assembling of executive or administrative agencies, the President is without that power and would remain without it under this bill.

Mr. CANNON. Is it possible that I am mistaken when I say that the Interstate Commerce Commission has increased freight rates time and again, after full investigation?

Mr GARD. The gentleman is correct about that. They have done so. The railroads have initiated the rates, and the commission has reviewed and determined them.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. And have they not also increased the wages of railway employees?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. MADDEN. The Wage Board have done that.

Mr. GARD. I am glad to have the question of any gentleman, and will answer, provided I have the time.

Mr. HICKS. Do I understand the gentleman to make the statement that there is no provision in this bill which will give the President the power to nullify any commission or board created by act of Congress?

Mr. GARD. Oh, no; I do not say that.

Mr. HICKS. What is the gentleman's interpretation?

Mr. GARD. The interpretation of this bill is that, to use the words of the bill, the President has the power to take commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer and assemble the executive or administrative powers of that agency for one purpose, and that purpose is briefly expressed when I say for the national security and defense, because the national security and defense at this time, I assume, is understood to comprehend the administration under legal forms of the Government of the United States during this war emergency.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield just there? The wages have been increased by the Director General of Railways.

Mr. GARD. I said to the gentleman that I did not know about that.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman must have had the document; we all got it a day or two ago. Now, the power would rest with the Director of Railways to increase wages, would it not, and also freight tariffs?

Mr. MADDEN. That was not done under the direction of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CANNON. No; but the Director of Railways would fix the wages.

Mr. GARD. The Director of Railways has not fixed the wages.

Mr. CANNON. Who has the power to increase freight tariffs?

Mr. GARD. The Interstate Commerce Commission has the power at this time to determine rates for transportation on railroads, but what I am contending is that under this bill no additional power is conferred on the President of the United States to take that power away from the Interstate Commerce Commission in the absence of authority of legislative enactment by the Congress of the United States designating some other body to do that work. This is a legislative compact, and all that the President purposes to do, as I understand, is to assemble, wherever he finds them, for proper distribution, the administrative and executive forces of the United States, that they may be properly placed where they may be, regardless of departmental name, for one purpose, and that is for the purpose of national efficiency.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose 20 different branches of the Government were performing the same activities, the President could centralize them into one activity and so not have them duplicated?

Mr. GARD. Surely. We have come, as we all know, to use rather lightly a phrase called "red tape." "Red tape" is merely a popular expression for rules and regulations. It is not a creature of statute, but is composed of rules and regulations of the civil or military department. However that may be, this seems to be the bill which will take that into consideration, to say that the question of rules and regulations with which one department is hedging itself about in jealous adherence of its powers as against the possible encroachment by another department—call it by what name you may—shall be rearranged and redistributed for the greatest efficiency.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will not deny that the rate-making power now possessed by the Interstate Commerce Commission is a power covered under general language found at the top of page 2, and which has heretofore been conferred by law on the commission.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio has been so generous and his discussion of the bill is so interesting that I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I feel that I have occupied more time than my allotment as a member of the committee; and, while I have endeavored to present it in legal analysis, I have no desire for a great deal more time.

Mr. HICKS. I ask that his time be extended three minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I hope the gentleman will take the time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to inquire whether under this phraseology the President could not transfer those functions to the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. GARD. I do not think so. My contention is that functions other than executive and administrative could not be transferred if vested.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. GARD. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am interested in the gentleman's ideas of the powers conferred, and I would like to ask this specific question. Congress has very recently established a War-Finance Corporation and given to it some very important functions, among them the function of withholding three billion and one-half dollars from the people who apply for it. Under this bill could not the President take away from that corporation all or any part of its duties?

Mr. GARD. The President under this bill, as I view it, can transfer from the corporation the gentleman referred to any and all executive and administrative functions which it possesses.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And could give the Secretary of the Treasury the right to give or withhold credit to the extent of three and one-half billion dollars?

Mr. GARD. I am not familiar with the figures; I can only answer in a general way.

I have only to say in conclusion that I support the bill in the language in which it is written so that in this the greatest of the world's armed conflicts, where the Republic of the United States is seeking to maintain democracy, internal and international, it be not hampered or obstructed. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] for the purpose of offering a conference report.

REGISTRATION FOR MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I submit herewith for printing under the rule the conference report upon Senate joint resolution 124, providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States."

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 561).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 2: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the House insert "and all male persons."

Also amend the title by striking out the word "or," in line 2, and inserting in lieu thereof "and all male persons."

Amendment numbered 8: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the House insert the following: "Provided, That students who are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and students who are preparing for the practice of medicine and surgery in recognized medical schools, at the time of the approval of this act shall be exempt from the selective draft prescribed in the act of May 18, 1917"; and the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) providing for the registration for military service of all male persons citizens of the United States or residing in the United States who have, since the 5th day of June, 1917, and on or before the day set for the registration by proclamation by the President, attained the age of 21 years, in accordance with such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe under the terms of the act approved May 18, 1917, entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed on:

The Senate receded from all of the amendments of the House, except the amendment relating to the exemption of divinity and medical students. On the question of exempting divinity and medical students the conferees agreed that students of both classes who are actually in attendance upon such school on the date of the approval of the act should be exempted. This, of course, would not permit any subsequent entrance as a student at such schools in order to avoid the draft, which seems to have been the principal objection on the part of the House. The House conferees agreed to retain the Senate amendment also as to medical students now in bona fide attendance in medical colleges. This is no more nor less than what the President has actually done under the act of May 18, 1917, by which such students were furloughed until graduation. It was thought, in view of the large number of medical officers who have entered the Army service, that this exception was also important. The health of those who stay at home and support the Army is, of course, a matter of great importance.

CONSOLIDATION OF EXECUTIVE BUREAUS, ETC.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. EMERSON].

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, no loyal American would favor this bill in times of peace, and no loyal American should oppose it during this period of war. From a military standpoint, we are fighting the most efficient nation in the world. We must fight efficiency with efficiency. We must fight coordination with coordination. We must fight consolidation with consolidation.

There are many reasons why this bill should pass. In the first place, it is one of the most important war measures that has been brought before Congress. It organizes and centralizes the executive branches of this Government so that they may work with the highest degrees of efficiency during this war. It disposes of red tape. It places the responsibility for the efficient prosecution of this war in the hands of the Commander in Chief, where it belongs. It places the authority for the prosecution of this war in the hands of the Commander in Chief.

We must remove all obstacles and all obstructions to victory. We have gone a little strong on commissions in this country; and while commissions are harmless in peace times, they are absolutely useless in times of war.

I recall the fact that President Lincoln was handicapped by his advisers during the Civil War, and I do not intend that the President shall be handicapped by any vote I cast as a Member of this Congress. I also recall that Gen. Grant would not take command of the Union Army unless he had full command, and with that full and complete command he was able to write those immortal words, "Unconditional surrender."

We are a peace-loving Nation, and God knows we did not seek this war. We are now a nation in arms, and we must put on our armor and look and act like a nation in arms.

One of the most efficient branches of our Government is the Department of Justice, and I desire to commend the masterful way in which that department has been conducted during this war. What Congress should do is to pass these important war measures and the appropriation bills speedily and adjourn, and give the President a full and complete hand to conduct this war.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULD].

Mr. GOULD. Mr. Speaker, I feel it to be a duty that I owe to my fellow countrymen to propose an amendment to the Overman bill which would cover in a comprehensive way the matter of aircraft production. I have heretofore introduced a bill in this House providing specifically for the creation of an office in the Government to handle all aircraft production, and, to my mind, that bill covers the subject in a very thorough manner. But it will take time for that bill to become legislation, if it ever reaches that stage. This same object may be accomplished by an amendment to the Overman bill. An amendment has been accepted by the Senate on this subject, but, gentlemen of the House, that amendment does not specifically create the office of aircraft administrator, an office which is free and clear from all other departments of the Government, for the sole purpose of producing airplanes and all that goes with them. The Wadsworth amendment points the way by suggestion for the possible creation of an executive agency. This amendment reads, as section 3 of the bill:

That the President is further authorized to establish an executive agency which may exercise such jurisdiction and control over the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment as in his judgment may be advantageous; and, further, to transfer to such agency, for its use, all or any moneys heretofore appropriated for the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment.

My proposal is to create an executive administrator or agency for the sole purpose of aircraft production. My amendment reads:

That there is hereby created an executive agency which shall have full jurisdiction and control over all governmental activities in connection with aeronautics except operation; the agency so created shall be in charge of an aircraft administrator, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; there shall be transferred to such agency for its use all or any moneys heretofore appropriated for the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aircraft equipment and accessories; and, further, the President is hereby authorized to take such other steps as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this section.

At the proper time I propose offering this amendment and urging its adoption.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOULD. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Would not the effectiveness of that amendment be totally and entirely obliterated by the exercise of the other powers in the bill to transfer the same authority to some other department?

Mr. GOULD. It might.

Mr. GORDON. That is the difficulty with the amendment. If we adopt the gentleman's amendment the other provisions of the bill authorize its transfer to another department, so it would not amount to anything.

Mr. GOULD. I suppose so.

Mr. GORDON. It would be a vain thing, then, to adopt the amendment.

Mr. GOULD. The House will have an opportunity to talk that over.

We are only commencing to realize what an enormous subject this matter of aircraft is as applied to this war. It is as separate and distinct from the other branches of the service as the Army from the Navy. We have our land forces and our sea forces, and now we have our air forces. I might better say that we have the most vital need for air forces and for aeroplanes for their use. England has recognized the importance of this and has a separate department to handle the production of aeroplanes. We have all seen the disastrous result of the efforts here in our country to equip our soldiers with planes to protect them. We have been told that our boys in the trenches were compelled to defend themselves with revolvers from enemy aeroplane attacks.

Let us not discuss the question of our failing in the past; let us rather get down to the business of producing aeroplanes for this war, and create a department for that sole purpose, and place a man at the head of that department who shall be accountable only to the President and through him directly to the people. Let us place aeroplane construction where no other department or departments of the Government can get in a tangle as to who is or who is not responsible for failure to produce. We were led to believe—last fall—that an American engine that led the world had been created overnight. Those of us who were engineers, and especially manufacturing engineers, were, to say the least, doubtful. But the screen of official secrecy as to the true condition and official publicity as to the exaggerated condition were so perfect that it was not until our aircraft fiasco had become a matter of public scandal that the people of this country learned something of the status of the matter.

Have you stopped to think, gentlemen, if Germany, with knowledge of the difficulties of aeroplane-engine construction, had wanted to make us helpless in this war for the year 1918 and had an able representative in this country, what advice would he have given? Would he not have appealed to our American enthusiasm, our American pride, and even to our American patriotism, of a sort, and hinted to us, "Develop an engine all your own, beat the world, produce thousands of them; you can do it." Would not this have been the advice of Bernstorff if he had been with us or had left an able representative behind? Germany must have laughed up her sleeve, for she well knew that an aeroplane engine can not be developed overnight, and if we adopted one type of engine and failed to manufacture other types while that one type was being developed our air campaign for 1918 would be a failure.

We started in the race of aeroplane construction for battle use late in 1917. We should have incorporated the details of every good aeroplane engine with merit. We are late in the race now. Let us have an aeroplane department with a man at the head who is responsible only to the President and to the people, that man to be the biggest executive we can get, free from all political activities, free to go ahead and build aeroplanes, free from all departmental red tape, from the suggestions and ideas of those who may have any thought but the production of aeroplanes, aeroplane engines, and aeroplane accessories.

We have had a sad history connected with our start in this war from a manufacturer's standpoint, and, gentlemen, I appeal to you to-day, as a manufacturer and a business man, not so much as a Member of this House. Our people are entitled in this war to not one moment's delay in the production of things we need to fight this war. We have had enough theory; let us get down to the job. We want less official reports of wonders we are doing. We want results, and we want them now. The leaders of our various executive departments are suddenly required to do a business man's job. Speech can not be substituted for deeds. A great executive like Schwab is needed in every leading executive position. A good job has been done in the Shipping Board by his appointment, and good results will be accomplished if he is allowed to work unhindered, and it is your business and that of each one of us here in this House to see that that man is unhampered. Another good appointment is that of Mr. Stettinius in the War Department.

Now, let us create an opportunity for our President to do another good job in the aeroplane situation. It is our duty to create that executive department, free from interference by any other bureau or department, free to do a big job in a big way, accountable to our President direct, accountable to you and me and to all the people of the United States.

This is the people's war—your war and my war—and this country is saying this over and over again, and louder each time. It is the occasion for us to do our duty and do it now. Let us put through this amendment so rapidly that an aircraft administrator can get at his work at once. There are engines to be built, planes to be built—many kinds of planes. We must keep up with this battle. Our boys in the aeroplane service must have the biggest executive in America producing their aeroplanes for them. And we can not afford to let one boy fall to his death before his time if we can help it. It was a wicked thing to put our eggs all in one basket, to spend our money, and what was far more valuable, all our time, in developing one engine, no matter how good. What one of our allies has depended solely on one engine, and it may be conceded that they know something more about war than we do? Germany has not depended upon one engine, and again it can be conceded that we do not know as much about war as Germany.

Gentlemen, if you or I were in business—manufacturing business—and in the spring of 1917 were faced with the problem of producing aeroplanes by the spring of 1918 or going into the hands of a receiver, would we depend solely on one type of experimental and uncompleted engine? Would we spend all the money of our stockholders on that one type? Remember we had not only to develop that engine to a state of perfection where we could, as business men and engineers, say it was ready to be manufactured in great quantities, but we also had to manufacture those engines, install them in planes, and ship them to Europe. All this to keep us out of the hands of that receiver in the spring of 1918. What would you have done as sane business men and manufacturers?

Did we appropriate $640,000,000 for the sole purpose of hearing that it was spent, or did we have some vague idea that it was to be used in building aeroplanes? Gentlemen, we have appropriated the people's money at a time when every dollar is supposed to be spent to provide means to kill Germans and to keep our boys from being killed by Germans. The people are entitled to know how their money is spent. We ask of them great sacrifices to raise this money, and you and I are accountable to them for its proper expenditure, and ultimately we will have to account to them and to the men who are doing our fighting. What can we tell them about that $640,000,000?

Were we too proud in the spring of 1917 to ask our allies' advice about this vital subject, as to which they had three prior years of experience and we none? Was England too proud to use our Lewis gun when her need arose? We have finally accepted the famous French 75-millimeter gun in its original form after losing some eight months' precious time in trying to improve it. Why turn our backs on the obviously wise course of profiting by others' experiences?

We need a clean slate, a fresh start; the country demands it, is entitled to it, must have it. The whole aeroplane policy has been wrong from the start. Develop our own motor? Yes; fine, but do not have it the only one. Again, do not let us waste valuable time in getting into a country-wide argument as to who has been at fault—whether this man was right or whether that man was wrong. The main point is we have no aeroplanes and we must have them.

Either Secretary Baker was deceived or he was deceiving the people. If he was deceived, then the men who deceived him ought to go. If he deliberately deceived the people, then he ought to go. In any event, the people of the United States, engaged in the business of war, must have men in charge of that work in whose statements they can have absolute confidence. After this bitter experience the country is going to accept with hesitancy any so-called official statements from this source. We must have investigations. The guilty must be punished, but do not let us spend all our time and energy at this. We are being asked to be patient. We have been patient for a year. War time is not the time to be patient. We have come to the end of ours now. We demand results; we demand a proper expenditure of our money. We say it is a deplorable condition that these great United States with unlimited funds, unlimited resources, could not produce aeroplanes for battle use in a year's time. We demand that the policy that procured this delay be changed at once.

If a man goes to sleep on sentry duty, a handful of men may be lost as a result. If a man goes to sleep on our aeroplane program, the whole country may be lost. The result could not have been any worse if some one had gone to sleep here. Have we even a right to argue this question? We must have an aeroplane head with no one to interfere with him, and if that man fails then another must take his place until we find somebody who can do the work as the American people require.

We have been told in various and sundry reports that one great reason for delay was departmental red tape. Engineers would make certain plans, and then department heads would come along and change those plans or order them to do this and that. For instance, I have been informed that orders were issued over a period of two weeks for five different changes in colors for finishing aeroplanes. Any of you who is familiar with manufacturing knows that the only way to produce results in any plant is to have one man at the head and hold that man responsible. We have seen the delays and troubles in the Shipping Board. How has that problem been solved? By the selection of a great executive—probably one of the greatest executives in our country.

This war is going to be won or lost in the air, and the department which is responsible for the creation of our aircraft equipment should be given that job alone and should not be interfered with by any other department of the Government. It is our duty to-day to create a department with exclusive authority on the subject of the manufacture of aeroplanes, including aeroplane engines, planes, and accessories, a man who can go about his business in this tremendous enterprise without a word of interference from anybody. Give that man unlimited power, unlimited money, and make him free from all possible political connection from either party, and let the American people know that this, their biggest job in the war, is going to be done by some one who is responsible to the American people. It is only in this way that we can save valuable time, every hour of which may mean disaster.

Investigation will show there has been awful delay due partly to the fact that this great subject of aeroplane construction, which should be a department by itself, has been handled in various departments.

The only phase of the whole aeroplane program, which is in reasonably good shape, is the question of training planes, and this has been largely due to the fact that we had training planes at the start and permitted manufacturers to go ahead and make them somewhere near the type and types which they were prepared to produce, but here again these manufacturers constantly received orders to change this part and that part, and sometimes for no apparent reason the production was delayed, but in spite of this we are in reasonably good production of training planes at this time.

Does anyone here know how many of our aviators have been brought back from France because of lack of aircraft equipment? Do you know whether the report is true that examination of candidates for training, in view of ultimately becoming commissioned in the aviation section, has been indefinitely postponed?

After the young men have been trained in the training planes they must advance a step and be trained in what may be called supertraining planes. We have had an example of a very excellent type of supertraining plane at the aviation field here in Washington. This plane contained a small rotary engine and develops enough speed to accustom the pilots to that advanced step in their profession. After that these men must be trained in the actual battle planes and scout planes, which have a still greater speed, and as to which we are absolutely unequipped. Is it not a fact that at this time our men are not being trained in the necessary step between the training planes and the scout planes for the simple reason that we have not got the aeroplanes for them?

This is a new era and one in which false steps resulting in delays may be vital. It will require a brave man, indeed, to accept the position of aircraft administrator and assume all the responsibilities that go with it. But the great difficulty of the job requires a man who is responsible and who can put through his policies without delay, and if those policies are not successful, the discovery will be made promptly, and one step will be enough to cure the harm and a new man can be appointed.

We have seen the kaleidoscopic changes in personnel on the battle front of Europe, and it has only been with these changes that the defense against the Germans has been made successful to date.

Gentlemen, if there was ever any need to create a Navy Department, if there was ever any need to create a department in charge of the Army, if there was ever any need to create a department in charge of anything in our form of government, there is crying need at this time to create an executive agency with absolute charge of aircraft production. Let us not confuse this question with any political discussion of policy.

It is our province in this House to enact legislation, and we are the representatives of the people and should fulfill that obligation. If we have ever had a duty imposed upon us, it is imposed upon us now, and we should not shrink from it for any reason under the sun. We are considering granting to our President in this bill the greatest powers that have ever been granted to any Chief Executive of a democracy, and we should give him the power to create this essential executive agency for aircraft production, and then having created that essential executive agency for aircraft production, leave it to men trained for that work. It is strictly a manufacturer's job, and men trained in manufacturing lines who have had experience in great enterprises should be given the responsibility and the power to make that responsibility effective, and to deliver our aircraft equipment to the Military Establishment. I might be so bold as to suggest that the root of all our difficulties in procuring supplies, equipment, ordnance, and so forth, for the Military Establishment has been due to the fact that we have required our men trained in military arts to suddenly and without sufficient preparation embark upon the greatest manufacturing enterprise the world has ever seen. Leave to industry the producing of materials to fight with and to the military branches of the service the job of fighting.

I appeal to Democrats and Republicans alike and beg you to make no party issue one way or the other of this great question.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY].

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. Speaker, there are but two questions which need concern the House in considering this bill. The first is, Is the proposed measure constitutional? The second is, Is it a wise grant of power? If any shall answer the first question in the negative, of course he can not vote for the bill. No Representative can vote for a measure which he believes to be unconstitutional. He has taken an oath of office to support the Constitution. That, if nothing else, would preclude him lending support to a measure which he believes violates the Constitution. When this bill came first into the Senate its constitutionality seemed a grave question to many of the Senators. As the discussion progressed, however, that contention was generally abandoned and I take it now that no lawyer, if called upon to pass on that question, would give it as his opinion that this grant of power is unconstitutional. If he should think otherwise I am curious to know what provision of the bill, what particular authorization of power, could give warrant for such a conclusion? In what respect does it grant to the President of these United States powers which Congress has not authority to grant him? It deals with agencies created by Congress.

Congress certainly can modify what it has created or abolish its creatures altogether. Therefore its constitutionality would seem to be settled. Then the sole remaining question for us to determine is, Is it wise to grant to the Chief Executive in this time of war the authority proposed in this measure? I answer yes. There is but little authorized here we have not already granted in other measures. This is largely coordination of authorities already bestowed. All that is vital in this bill is contained in 24 lines. Most of the language employed merely sets out the necessity and reasons for this grant of power or else contains limitations upon the exercise of that power. Beginning with the last word in line 8, page 1, and including the remainder of that page and down to and including the first word of line 7 on page 2, appear all that is material in section 1. Beginning with line 21 and reading to the end of the section are the important grants contained in section 2. Section 3 authorizes the President to establish an executive agency to deal with aeroplane construction if in his judgment it may be advantageous so to do.

In this there is no grant of new power, nor does it deprive of powers any existing board heretofore created. Section 4 is a limitation upon the expenditure of funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated. Section 5 is obscure. Just what its real meaning, if any, is I do not believe anyone knows. It certainly grants no new authority, and is possibly merely a request to the President. If a suggestion, it merely requests the President to report to Congress what may be his conclusion after an investigation as to the wisdom of legislation to permanently abolish either departments or bureaus. This is no grant of power, because he has that power now. It is no limitation, because nothing in this bill grants the President power to abolish permanently either departments or bureaus. In my judgment, it could be stricken from the bill without injury. However, I shall not suggest that be done. The proviso contained in lines 13 to 16, inclusive, on page 2, is entirely without force or effect. It says affirmatively that which every lawyer knows to be true; that is, that vested rights accruing under this bill shall not be destroyed by its termination at the end of war. If it had any purpose at all in the mind of the draftsman, it would seem to be to solace some timid soul. It has no legal effect.

It is doubtless true that any Member of this House, had he been writing the bill in the first instance, and had been in entire sympathy with all of its provisions, could have drawn it in much better language and in a more condensed form. Three of the six sections contain all the grants of authority and limitations which are essential. I am not criticizing the bill, but can not refrain from calling attention to the loose manner in which it was drafted. But the question of its form is not vital, and time is of the essence of this matter. Too long already has its enactment been delayed, and I shall resist, therefore, any effort to amend it in any particular. It came to us in this form; let us pass it as it is. Neither its poor construction of sentence or loosely drawn sections can affect vitally its import. Therefore we can afford to overlook inaccuracies and inelegance of construction. The vital thing is to grant to the President at this time the authority so to redistribute and coordinate the various functions of the executive departments of the Government that the highest efficiency may be obtained. When that is accomplished the whole aim and object of the proposed measure will have been attained. Therefore, then, the only question, as it seems to me, that need concern us is the wisdom, or lack of wisdom, of granting to the President the authority sought to be conferred by this measure. If we think he should have this authority, we should vote for this measure without amendments. If we think it unwise to grant him this power, there is but one course open, and that is to oppose it. I repeat this because it is apparent that no constitutional question can be injected. No Member can vote against this proposed bill on that account. For it is apparent that it deals with creatures created by Congress, and therefore Congress has full power to pass legislation modifying in any way it may seem wise to it the powers and functions heretofore bestowed upon these creatures of the legislative will.

The attitude of some gentlemen in both the other branch of the National Congress and this who now seem so solicitous that the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, and the War Finance Corporation shall be omitted from those agencies over which this bill seeks to give the administration full control is to me a subject of some surprise. If I am not mistaken, those Senators and Representatives who seem most to fear that some change in the organization of these governmental agencies may prove hurtful to the people were most vigorous in their opposition to the enactment of the Federal reserve act. They consumed days and weeks in giving vent to their fears that the Federal Reserve Board which was to be created by the act would wholly destroy the financial institutions of this country. Now, to hear them in their expressed fear that should the President be empowered to change in any respect or diminish in the slightest degree the authority of the Federal Reserve Board is tantamount to assaulting the very foundations of free government. They are equally solicitous, or nearly so, that the corporation recently created to control credits shall likewise be excluded from the provisions of this bill. There seems to be with them three sacred things beside which even liberty pales into insignificance. These three holies of holies are the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, and the War Finance Corporation. I do not share their fears. I believe all three of the agencies are vital. I believe the President realizes this as much as they and is in as good a position to know what is best to be done under the circumstances. I feel he is as patriotic. I believe he loves his country as well and is as passionately devoted to our institutions as they and is as loyal to the flag. Therefore I have no hesitation in including these three with other agencies within the grant of authority contained in this bill.

I do this knowingly, because I do not agree with the gentleman from Ohio, who has just expressed a belief that under the provisions of this bill the President has no authority to interfere with the rate-making functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think he would have that power when this bill becomes a law. I think all the executive and administrative agencies heretofore created by Congress and all the boards to administer these agencies come within the provisions of this bill and that all of the functions they now exercise when this measure becomes a law can be changed by the President if he sees fit to do so. I am willing to grant him this authority, and I do not fear he will abuse it. If the changes should be made in order to render more effective these agencies, let them be made.

Why, a year ago by our vote for war we dedicated to the service of freedom the life of every American boy between the ages of 21 and 31 years, and recently we brought within its provisions every boy who shall attain the age of 21 until this war for freedom shall have been won. By our vote we gave these boys' lives and our national honor and existence into the keeping of the President of these United States. By the declaration of war we thus gave to the President the power of life and death. In addition to that, by acts of Congress, we have given him control over all the commerce of this country. He has the power by proclamation to say what shall be transported and what shall be left, what industries may exist and what may be destroyed, what lines of transportation shall be open and what lines shall be closed. After we have granted all these powers and laid upon him all these responsibilities, I am not very solicitous, at least not oversolicitous, that in the carrying into effect of this commission of the American people to preserve our national honor and our national life that some act of his may disturb some private business interest in this country; that he may do something that will lose somebody a profit. I say this because the attempt being made here to grant the President authority over the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, and the recently created corporation to control credits seems to meet with such bitter opposition from some of the Representatives, and met with such intense opposition in the other body. These three institutions deal with finances. The control of either or all of these and a vital redistributing of their functions can not destroy our national life or national honor; it can affect profits and nothing else. So, then, the solicitations of these gentlemen to preserve inviolate all these powers to these three agencies can arise from no other source than the fear that a modification by the President of any of the powers or functions heretofore exercised by either of these agencies may cause somebody a loss of money. I say, they fear it will cause a loss to some one because they, of course, would not object if that change should bring profit. Therefore, I repeat, the only fear that the President's acts in modifying the functions of some or all of these agencies is it may cost some one money, and with that view I have no sympathy.

We have said in our declaration of war that we pledge all our lives and all our fortunes to destroy the military autocracy of Germany. We handed over with these young men all our resources to the President of these United States, and to-day he has the power as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of these United States to order Gen. Pershing and those brave American boys fighting with him in France to lay down their arms and furl their colors. He has the power to command every captain sailing an American ship to take that ship into a German port and pull down his flag in abject surrender. We knew he would have that power when we voted the declaration of war because the Constitution makes him the Commander in Chief of all our armies and our navies. If we were not afraid to draw the sword and risk our Nation's honor, our lives, and our resources in his keeping, why then cavil now about granting to him the power to modify the functions of these administrative agencies of government, including those three mentioned? I can not conceive of the motives that would impel one to place in the hands of the President these mighty agencies for good or bad, for weal or woe, that he now has and withhold from him any authority which might enable him more surely and more speedily to crown our sacrifices with victory. We laid on him the duty to protect our national life and national honor and he accepted that great responsibility. Shall we now make our sacrifices and his efforts futile, for fear in the redistribution of the functions of government somebody may make less profits?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman believes he has the power under this language and under this bill to transfer the duties of the Interstate Commerce Commission to some other body?

Mr. CARAWAY. I have not a doubt about that, sir.

Mr. CANNON. Well, there seems to be some doubt about it from the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD]. I agree with the gentleman from Arkansas. I am willing to grant him that power.

Mr. CARAWAY. So am I.

Mr. CANNON. Otherwise you would vote the other way? I agree with the gentleman instead of disagreeing.

Mr. CARAWAY. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois, and I am not afraid to grant the power. As I said before, we have put our national honor in his hands. By the declaration of war we made him the absolute arbiter of the fate of this Nation. We have given him the control of the lives of all the young men of this country between the ages of 21 and 31 years, and I am willing to extend the age limit both up and down, if it is necessary, and I am willing to give to the President of the United States all the Army necessary to win victory in this war. I am not afraid to trust him. And I am not saying that simply because the President of the United States at this particular time belongs to the party of which I am a member. I would do it just as quickly if he belonged to another party. I am perfectly willing to surrender any right that I have, and I am equally willing to help to take from anyone else any right that he may think he has, if it becomes necessary to do so, in order to preserve our national existence. [Applause.]

Mr. DEMPSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARAWAY. I will.

Mr. DEMPSEY. As I understand the argument of these gentlemen—and I am not coinciding with their argument—in reference to the Federal Reserve Board and Interstate Commerce Commission, it is this: Not that any money is going to be made or lost, but what they fear is that men, instead of being selected by and with the advice of the Senate, may have their functions transferred to men of less standing who are appointed without the advice and consent of the Senate. In other words, they believe in the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Federal Reserve Board, but they are afraid men of less ability and less standing may exercise the functions of those boards.

Mr. CARAWAY. In other words, they believe the Interstate Commerce Commission and Federal Reserve Board have more knowledge and patriotism than the President of the United States?

Mr. DUPRÉ. Does not, as a matter of fact, the President of the United States appoint the members of the Federal Reserve Board and also of the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. CARAWAY. They fear he has lost his power to choose good men.

Mr. DEMPSEY. "By and with the advice and consent of the Senate"; perhaps somewhat controlled by the knowledge that they would have to be agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. CARAWAY. It is rather peculiar that the men of whom the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] speaks do not fear that money may be lost or made, and inasmuch as that is the only effect change in these agencies could produce, it becomes therefore apparent that that is the moving cause back of the fear that the President may exercise his power unwisely. [Applause.]

In conclusion, permit me again to say I do not share this fear. I trust Woodrow Wilson, our President, the American people know and trust him—aye, the lovers of freedom and justice everywhere know and trust him—and without fear or hesitation I place in his prayerful keeping these additional powers and ask God to give to us and to a war-weary world the patience and courage that our President is displaying now—the patience to wait and the courage to go forward until a victory comes to us that will make war a curse that will come never again to the children of men. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to vote for a bill that I believe will be the beginning of correcting the evils, the mistakes, and the inefficiency of the departments, bureaus, and commissions. I think that a great deal of the work that has been done by the various bureaus and departments is, in a word, being duplicated by others of a similar character, and that this has been growing for some time. The creation of new bureaus and commissions has had the result of bringing this about. It is going to be a great accomplishment in giving to the President the authority to redistrict and fix the various functions, duties, and powers of these various bureaus. I do not believe there is any great danger of the functions, or, rather, the powers, of rate making, and so forth, in the Interstate Commerce Commission, nor the powers of the Federal Reserve Board, being usurped by other departments. It is my judgment that the President recognizes that these commissions have been created by an act of Congress and that he would not in a bill of this kind take away from those commissions those powers and those duties. He has given to us his word that it is not his intention to do that very thing, and of which complaint and fear have been expressed. I have every confidence in believing that the President is absolutely sincere in that statement. I believe the President has one aim and purpose in view in this legislation, and that is to get the greatest possible service and efficiency out of the various departments, bureaus, and commissions, and so on, of the Government, to the end that they may be used in the interests of this war.

It is a war measure, and it is expressly so stated. We owe as a duty to the President of the United States to give him the powers that he believes he ought to have and the powers that he asks for and feels are necessary that he should have in carrying on this great war. I am one of those who feel it my duty to vote to him these powers, and I feel that I am best serving my country in so doing since the inception of this war, and I feel that most all of us in this Congress have had the same mind. Some gentlemen have expressed doubt at times and criticisms, but they have all been with a purpose and intent of getting the best results out of this war. Our minds are centered on that alone.

With that aim and purpose in view I shall gladly vote for this bill, and I hope, as I stated in the beginning of my remarks, that we will at least come to a realization of what many of us feel and believe we ought to have, and that is centralization with reference to authority and also as to appropriation bills. I believe that now a great deal of money is being uselessly spent in these various bureaus and departments and that much is being granted by Congress that ought not to be granted. I feel that we ought to have a system in this country such as is found in most of the civilized countries to-day—a budget system, which will bring before Congress in a sensible, concise way the necessities for money to operate the Government. I believe that the next request of the President along the lines of departmental work will be a request of that kind for the enactment of legislation that will create one body for the purpose of handling the financial recommendations of the Government.

Now, we receive from the Secretary of the Treasury the estimates made up by the various departments, and, as we all know, they never underestimate what they think they ought to have; in many cases they do not even know the amount of money that they will need or require. The result is that the estimates are sent to the Treasury unscientifically arranged and worked out. Under the law the Secretary of the Treasury can do nothing except forward those recommendations and those estimates to Congress. If the Secretary of the Treasury were charged by law with the responsibility of making up and sending those estimates for the consideration of Congress, I think we would save a great deal of money.

And so I believe that out of this legislation that we are now considering we shall in a reasonable time get a recommendation or request of that kind. Members give due credence to the beliefs and the views of the President touching these matters, and have no doubt great confidence in him, and feel that his responsibility in these times is such that what he says and asks of Congress must receive serious and favorable consideration.

We in this Congress, Mr. Speaker, regardless of party, have been doing those things that all patriotic men ought to do—we have been putting aside every personal and political consideration and have been looking with one object and purpose in view, namely, to assist our Nation in these great and trying times. Democrats and Republicans both have been doing that in both branches of this Congress. And in doing that we are only echoing and voicing the sentiments of the American people. They themselves have put aside all political thought and consideration in these times, and are devoting their energy to carrying on this war and to raising the money that is necessary.

And, Mr. Speaker, the people in doing that are not of any one nationality or of any one party, but it is the great body of the American people. Some have found it their duty to get up in public places and elsewhere and preach loyalty—preach standing up for the flag. But gentlemen, it is not necessary that any man should feel that he should be called upon to do that, because the whole American people are practically as solid and united to-day for our country as the people of any nation in the history of the world. It is not so of any one class of people or of any one nationality, but it is so of all people. The people of German birth and German extraction, the sons and daughters of those who were born in Germany, are as patriotic as those of any other nationality, and so it is with all sections of this country. In the city which I have the honor in part to represent there are a large number of people of German birth, men, some of them, who were born in Germany.

A large portion of our population are of that kind, and they are loyal American citizens. I have watched with interest and with care, in the public press and otherwise, to find where disloyalty comes from, when I have heard some Members of Congress and others outside talk about loyalty and about disloyalty in people of German birth. I have found in my city practically no one who could be characterized as disloyal. I have found them earnestly and faithfully working for the interest and success of our country. I know of instances where men and women born in Germany, whose parents were born in Germany, who have been doing more for our country in these times than some of those who are proud of the long residence of their generations of ancestors in this country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DYER. May I have five minutes more?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. DYER. I know of a case of a German girl working for a very aristocratic and wealthy family. She invested her savings, several hundred dollars, in liberty bonds. She did that because she felt it was her duty. In talking with the lady for whom she was working in this aristocratic and wealthy family, she said, "I guess you have bought a lot of these liberty bonds." This lady said, "We bought $500 worth. We can not afford to invest our money unless we get 6 per cent." People of that kind are some of the very ones who are trying to bring discredit upon those of German birth and German ancestry.

Here in this city of Washington, at Keith's Theater, a few days ago a resident of this city, Mr. Gus Buchholz, made an address urging the people in the audience to purchase liberty bonds. Here is what he said in his address at Keith's Theater:

I want you to know there are no more German-Americans. I am an American born in Germany. I arrived in America when 17 years of age. After having been here but two weeks I took out my first papers. At the age of 22 I received my citizenship. For 21 years I have been a citizen—a 100 per cent American. Now people ask me how I feel about this war and liberty bonds. I am going to tell you. I feel like every American whom I know—stick to our country, stick to our flag, because I love this country. Our former ambassador to Germany, James Gerard, stated the Kaiser dislikes the German-Americans more than the born Americans. Why? Because the Kaiser knows that we are loyal Americans. When the United States declared war on Germany my one sense of duty was to America, and my oath of loyalty knows of no conditions and no reservations. I have invested $30,000 in liberty bonds and war stamps, not because I was born in Germany—nobody forced me to buy that amount—but because I considered it the best patriotic investment during war times in any country, if you are patriotic and love your country.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the sentiment of the great body of men and women in this country of German birth and German ancestry; and I say to you, and to the American people, that we are especially pleased to know that the President of the United States is showing due deference and consideration to the feelings and desires and ambitions of all people. He is not like some people in this country who are decrying people of German birth or ancestry; but he says that that great body of American citizens in this country are as loyal as those of any other country, and that the disloyal people are found among those of every nationality, one here and one there. I submit this for the purpose of evidencing the desire of all people in this country, regardless of nationality or politics, to give the President all power and authority that he believes he needs to carry this war to a successful conclusion, and to bring honor and glory to our country in the quickest possible time. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE], a member of the committee.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, the main purpose of this legislation is not a new subject to the House. President Taft during his administration brought it to the attention of the House in a message in which he advocated substantially what is proposed to be done in the pending act.

There are certain mischiefs now existing in the executive departments that this bill is designed to correct. These mischiefs are substantially as follows:

(1) In numerous cases more than one bureau or other administrative agency is authorized by law to render the same service. (2) In most of these cases the various duly authorized agencies are ambitious to render all the services within their power. (3) In some cases actual duplication of service has resulted. (4) In a large number of cases the legitimate development of bureaus and other agencies is hampered by the knowledge that it would bring about conflict with the work of other bureaus and agencies. Such conditions result in misdirection of effort and inefficiency.

This bill proposes to correct this situation by authorizing the President to make such a redistribution of the functions among the executive agencies as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer in such manner as in his judgment shall be best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act.

This being the purpose of the act, during the discussion on the floor this afternoon the question was raised by my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], as to whether or not this was the exercise of a constitutional power. No new power is conferred by the legislation proposed.

No new functions are conferred upon any bureau or any administrative or executive officer. All that is proposed by this bill is that the President shall have the power to make a redistribution of the powers and functions already conferred upon the executive department. Is that a conferring of legislative power? Manifestly it is not. It is simply conferring administrative power on the President. The real distinction between legislative power and the conferring of a mere administrative function is between the delegation of power to make the law, which necessarily involves a discretion as to what it shall be, and conferring authority or discretion as to its execution, to be exercised under and in pursuance of the law. The first can not be done; to the latter no valid objection can be made.

A full and complete discussion of this distinction between the delegation of legislative power and conferring a mere administrative function will be found in the decision of Field against Clark (143 U. S.), where the validity of a power conferred on the President under the tariff act passed just prior to that decision which conferred on the President the power to suspend rates.

Now, that power has been exercised by this Government since it was founded. It has been conferred upon the President in early times under the embargo act whenever the President saw fit to do it. It has been conferred in numerous acts covering two pages of the decision of the Supreme Court, to which I have referred and which I will not take the time of the House to refer to in detail.

That being the case, no further discussion of this particular question is necessary, but there were several other questions referred to in the debate which, it seemed to me, might well be disposed of at this time also.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] propounded the question whether or not the authority existed to take away from an officer who had been confirmed by the Senate the power which he had exercised and confer it upon another. My own thought upon that subject briefly is this: Where the officer is confirmed by the Senate, the power that he has exercised can be conferred upon another officer who has been confirmed by the Senate, and that view has been sustained by the Supreme Court. In the case which was referred to by Senator Kellogg in his speech on this subject—the case of Shoemaker against the United States—where certain functions were conferred upon an officer who had been confirmed by the Senate and certain additional powers were given to him and the court in the course of its decision said:

As, however, the two persons whose eligibility is questioned were at the time of the passage of the act and of their action under it officers of the United States who had heretofore been appointed by the President, and confirmed by the Senate, we do not think that because additional duties germane to the offices already held by them were devolved upon them by the act it was necessary that they should be again appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. It can not be doubted, and it has frequently been the case, that Congress may increase the power and duties of an existing office without thereby rendering it necessary that the incumbent should be again nominated and appointed.

It may be remarked in passing also that during the debate in the Senate upon this bill, Senator KNOX, who is probably one of the ablest constitutional lawyers in the Senate, gave it as his judgment that without the passage of this act the President, as the Chief Executive of the Nation and as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, already possesses the power to do the things conferred by this act. That was his opinion. I know it is not shared by a great many people, and I refer to it to show the diversity of opinion in respect to the power already existing in the Executive.

Reference was made to the Interstate Commerce Commission and the withdrawing of the power now vested in that commission with respect to the fixing of rates. On that subject there seemed to be during the course of the debate some slight confusion of thought. The Interstate Commerce Commission does not possess the power to primarily fix the rates. They never did possess that power. They possess the power where railroads themselves have fixed the rates of revising them, and then there would be a hearing on the subject followed by a judgment; but they possess no power to initiate rates, and under the military act which was passed some few years ago authorizing the President to take over the railroads in time of war, he was given full control of the railroads. The question is, What was meant by the word "control" under the terms of that act? Most people who have examined the question came to the conclusion that this Congress at that time gave the President the power to fix rates, but under the legislation recently enacted relating to railroads now under the control of the Government the President was given the power of initiating rates, and that without the passage of this law here would be the law to-day.

He has the power to initiate rates, and the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the terms of that same bill, has the power to revise those rates. That is the law as it exists to-day, independent of this act. The question is asked whether or not, under the terms of this bill, the President would have the power to withdraw from the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to pass on rates in this manner and vest it in some other executive officer. To my mind the terms of this bill are broad enough to confer that power upon him. I think he could exercise that power if it is an executive act, because all that this act does is to confer upon the President the right to transfer executive functions. It refers to no other functions. It reduces itself down to the question, Is the fixing of a rate an executive or a judicial function? The Supreme Court has said primarily the fixing of a rate is an administrative and executive function.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, it would involve the inquiry whether the fixing of a rate by the Interstate Commerce Commission is a judicial question, and it may become a judicial question only in one aspect, and that is whether or not the rate fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission is of a confiscatory character and therefore an illegal taking of property.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEELE. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman has doubtless noticed that section 2 provides that in carrying out the purposes of the act the President is authorized to utilize, coordinate, or consolidate any executive or administrative commission. That section providing for the transfer from one commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, and so forth, is not confined to executive commissions or bureaus.

Mr. STEELE. It is confined, as I stated, to executive or administrative matters, and as I stated a while ago in the course of my discussion with reference to the rate power, that generally the fixing of a rate is an executive or administrative function, and this act does not attempt to confer upon the President the right to transfer any judicial power. It reduces itself down to a question of whether the rate-fixing power is exclusively administrative or executive or combines with it certain judicial functions. If it combines with it judicial functions, then it could not be transferred. So the Supreme Court said recently that it was an executive or administrative function; but I can also see, as I stated a moment ago, that it may become a judicial question when the question is raised whether the rate is confiscatory in its character. It would then combine with it certain judicial functions. Those are my views generally on that branch of the question. So far as the legislation of this House is concerned during the entire war period, we have conferred upon the President under the food-control act, under the railroad-control act, under the shipping act, the war administration, the Finance Bureau, powers which seem to be far greater than are attempted to be conferred under this act. If he can be trusted with those powers under this general war legislation, it seems to me that he can very readily be trusted with powers conferred under this act. Therefore I shall vote for the bill. [Applause.]

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. POLK, for two days, on account of illness; and

To Mr. FIELDS, for three days, on account of illness.

CONSOLIDATION OF EXECUTIVE BUREAUS, ETC.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN].

Mr. PLATT. If the gentleman will yield to me for a moment, I want to call his attention to the fact that we are discussing one of the most important bills which has passed, and that most of the time just five Democrats were listening to the eloquent speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEELE].

Mr. WEBB. And only 10 Republicans.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, we had 25 here listening to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania. We appreciate a good argument.

Mr. WEBB. The RECORD will show at least I was here. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN].

Mr. MCKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, in a crisis like this, when it is necessary for extraordinary centralizing powers to be granted by Congress to the several departments of the executive branch of the Government, it is to be expected that every citizen will turn to the Constitution of the Republic to ascertain whether such powers are warranted by that organic instrument. The motive which should prompt the citizen in so doing should be an honest and earnest desire to safeguard the rights of the people and to preserve the Government.

I have no quarrel with the citizen who is honestly of the opinion that such powers can not be granted under the organic law, nor do I question his patriotism when he contends for the same, provided that in such contention he does not go to the extreme of endangering the existence of the very Government which he seeks to preserve. On the other hand, there are those throughout the length and breadth of the country who are opposed to any kind of government and, under the guise of constitutional privilege, are questioning the constitutionality of the laws and powers which are being granted in this emergency. They are not contending in the forum of the courts, but are fanning the flame of dissatisfaction which temporarily arises by the curtailing of privileges and conveniences caused by the enactment of war measures, and who, like a wolf in sheep's clothing, are pretending to stand upon the Constitution while they are indirectly and purposely impeding the efforts of the Nation to preserve its life.

In times like these it is impossible to preserve the same equilibrium and poise as in peace times. A nation in war, like an individual in a combat where death may result, does not maintain cool and collected judgment. A jury in the trial of an individual charged with a homicide committed in such a combat is required under the law to view the circumstances and conditions as they existed at the time from the standpoint of the defendant. Shall a nation fighting for its life and the preservation of the liberty of not only its own citizens but of the world be held to a higher standard?

Members of this House understand full well the war powers vested by the Constitution in the President, and distinguished Members have spoken illuminatingly to this body upon this subject. It is not my purpose in the time allotted to me to rehearse to the Members of this House a subject understood by many of them better than myself, but I wish to call the facts to the attention of the average American citizen, who is too busy doing his bit to win the war to investigate the constitutionality of the war legislation of Congress. I shall be satisfied if I shall have been able to fortify the mind of the laymen against the arguments of misled and disloyal citizens, who either purposely or unwittingly promulgate German propaganda.

Article II, section 2, clause 1, of the Constitution makes the President of the United States Commander in Chief of the Army, the Navy, and the militia when called into the service of the United States. Before the ratification of the Constitution by the States there were those who claimed that this power should be granted by an act of Congress, but the fathers of the Republic were too wise and far-seeing to create a provision that might lead to the destruction of the Government they were founding. This power was granted by the Constitution, and Congress is without authority to enlarge or diminish it. Under this provision, as Commander in Chief, the President may do whatever, in his judgment, will destroy or weaken the power of the enemy. In dealing with the foe he is only limited by the accepted rules of international law. It is for him to decide where the troops are to be sent and where the fleets are to be assembled and stationed. It is his right to assume control of all enemy territory occupied by our armed forces and to establish such military control to govern the same as he may decide; but within the limits of the Nation, where the civil courts are open and in unobstructed exercise of their functions, it is beyond the power of the President to declare martial law to try civilian citizens. This was so decided by a majority opinion in the often quoted case of Ex parte Milligan by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1866.

There is much discussion of the constitutional right of Congress to grant autocratic powers to the President during this emergency. All acts of Congress which simply facilitate the powers of the President as Commander in Chief do not confer any additional powers, for the reason that the founders of the Government in adopting the Constitution granted autocratic powers to the President as Commander in Chief.

The wisdom of the fathers of the Republic is apparent in this present hour.

In a Republic like ours supreme power to act in a great crisis must be lodged in some individual. To mobilize a great Republic for war is a gigantic task, and to do so hurriedly and efficiently little time can be devoted to the discussion of methods, but decision and action must be prompt.

In the present war the President has realized the tremendous task and responsibility thrown upon him by virtue of his position as Commander in Chief. Although clothed with powers of a dictator he has nevertheless submitted to Congress for its enactment into law measures that he could have arbitrarily put in force by Executive order. Except in those instances where urgent pressing necessity required he has been prone to submit his requests to Congress for its approval of the exercise of certain powers and the promulgation of rules and regulations made necessary by the war. His action in this respect discloses the fact that he does not desire to play the rôle of a dictator nor use the great powers conferred upon him merely for the pleasure of exercising the same. The alacrity with which this Congress has granted the requests of the President for war legislation makes it unnecessary for him to resort to the use of Executive orders. No doubt if the Members of the House of Representatives in the dark days of the Civil War had as a whole willingly supported President Lincoln, as this House has supported President Wilson, there would have been no occasion for President Lincoln in his fourth annual message to have said:

> In a great national crisis like ours unanimity of action among those seeking a common end is very desirable—almost indispensable.

It is within the power of Congress to declare war or declare that a state of war exists, but a declaration of war made by Congress immediately sets in motion the war powers of the President as Commander in Chief. Whenever the President submits to Congress for its action matters which, as Commander in Chief, he could bring about by Executive order, he does not waive any of the powers granted him by the Constitution, but merely submits the matter to Congress for its approval or disapproval of the proposed measure. The refusal of Congress to enact into law legislation included within the delegated powers of the President would not prevent the President from proceeding by Executive order. To determine what acts the President may do or what orders he may make under the power vested in him as Commander in Chief can never be definitely defined, because each emergency creates its own limitations. It might not be amiss at this time to call attention to some of the things that have been done by Presidents of the United States under their powers as Commander in Chief during certain crises that have arisen in the history of our country.

1. In 1794, during Washington's second administration, a general insurrection occurred in western Pennsylvania against enforcement of the excise act of March 3, 1791. At a Cabinet meeting Hamilton, Knox, and Bradford urged that the militia be called out; Randolph, who had succeeded to Jefferson's office, opposed, because he believed the effect would be to produce a civil war and also because he distrusted the militia. McKean, the chief justice of the State, suggested a commission to visit the disturbed districts; and Washington, with his unerring judgment, combined both plans. The commission's efforts produced a considerable change in public opinion among the frontiersmen, and resolutions of submission were twice adopted, but by this time nearly 15,000 militia from Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland, and Virginia had almost reached the scene. Hamilton, the President's representative, agreed with Gen. Henry Lee, of Virginia, the military head, that the expedition must proceed. The population offered no resistance. There were numerous arrests made, with few exceptions in total disregard of an amnesty and Washington's express orders. But it was at last settled that there was a Government and that the United States had the power and intent to enforce its laws.

2. "As in the days of colonial quarrels, there were two separate governments in Rhode Island; one, headed by Thomas Dorr, was brought into existence as a protest against undeniably gross inequalities in the suffrage. Dorr and his party were preparing to enforce their will by arms when President Tyler sent troops to crush the insurrectionary movement."

Without a word of warning to Congress, which was in full session, * * * he ordered Gen. CIVIL WAR.

[Quoted from: Bryce, James. The American Commonwealth. Vol. 1, pp. 51, 61.]

"Both as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and as charged with the 'faithful execution of the laws,' the President is likely to be led to assume all the powers which the emergency requires. How much he can legally do without the aid of statutes is disputed, for the acts of President Lincoln during the earlier part of the War of Secession, including his proclamation suspending the writ of habeas corpus, were subsequently legalized by Congress; but it is at least clear that Congress can make him, as it did make Lincoln, almost a dictator. And how much the war power may include appears in this, that by virtue of it and without any previous legislative sanction President Lincoln issued his emancipation proclamations of 1862 and 1863, declaring all slaves in the insurgent States to be thenceforth free, although these States were deemed to be in point of law still members of the Union.

* * * * * * *

"Abraham Lincoln wielded more authority than any single Englishman has done since Oliver Cromwell. It is true that the ordinary law was for some purposes practically suspended during the War of Secession. But it will always have to be similarly suspended in similar crises, and the suspension inures to the benefit of the President, who becomes a sort of dictator."

[Quoted from: Dunning, William Archibald, professor of history in Columbia University. Essays on the Civil War and Reconstruction. Macmillan Co., 1904, pp. 14–15, 15–16, 17–19, 20–21.]

The Presidential Dictatorship: The circumstances in which the Government found itself after the fall of Sumter were entirely unprecedented. The President was obliged to regard the uprising of the South as a simple insurrection; but the only parallel case, the Whisky Insurrection in Washington's administration, was so insignificant in comparison that from the very beginning a system of original construction of the Constitution had to be employed to meet the varied occasions for Executive as well as legislative action. Long before the end of the war the principles thus evolved had become so numerous and so far-reaching in their application as entirely to overshadow the most cherished doctrines of the old system.

* * * * * * *

The question presented to the administration by the commencement of hostilities was, Has this Government the power to preserve its authority over all its territory? The answer of the old school of constitutional lawyers was, "Yes; so far as it is conferred by the Constitution and the laws," but the answer we derive from the actual conduct of the war is, "Yes," without qualification.

Immediately upon the fall of Sumter the assertion of the new doctrine began. Before the assembling of Congress July 4 a series of proclamations by the President called into play forces deemed necessary to the preservation of the Nation. The calling out of the militia was based upon the law of 1795. Buchanan had declined to consider this law as applicable to the present circumstances. His delicacy, however, was a phase of his scruples about coercing a State—scruples entirely foreign to his successor.

* * * * * * *

Four days after the call for militia the President's purpose of ignoring the connection of the State governments with the rebellion was put to a severe test in his proclamation of a blockade of the ports of cotton States. He was obliged to speak of "the pretended authority" of those States, but only to declare that persons who, under such authority, molested United States vessels would be treated as pirates. This assumption by the Executive of the right to establish a blockade was rather startling to conservative minds. It seemed like a usurpation of the legislative power to declare war. For blockade is an incident of actual warfare and involves the recognition of belligerent rights. The constitutionality of the President's action, however, was affirmed by the Supreme Court in the Prize Cases, and hence Congress having acquiesced, it has the sanction of all three departments of the Government. Accordingly the President, as Commander in Chief, can determine without reference to Congress the time when an insurrection has attained the proportions of a war, with all the consequences to person and property that such a decision entails.

Further action by the President previous to the meeting of Congress included a call for the enlistment of 40,000 three-year volunteers and the increase of the Regular Army by over 20,000 men and the Navy by 18,000. Mr. Lincoln himself doubted the constitutionality of these measures.

Whether strictly legal or not [he says they] were ventured upon what appeared to be a popular demand and a public necessity, trusting then, as now, that Congress would readily ratify them. It is believed that nothing has been done beyond the constitutional competency of Congress. (Message of July 4, 1861.)

This frank substitution of a "popular demand" for a legal mandate as a basis for Executive action is characteristic of the times. The President's course was approved and applauded. Howe, of Wisconsin, proclaimed in the Senate that he approved it in exact proportion to the extent to which it was a violation of the existing laws. The general concurrence in the avowed ignoring of the organic law emphasizes the completeness of the revolution which was in progress. The idea of a government limited by the written instructions of a past generation had already begun to grow dim in the smoke of battle.

The remaining subject dealt with in the President's proclamations was the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus. Southern sympathy in Maryland had taken so demonstrative a form that summary measures of repression were resorted to by the Government. Gen. Scott was authorized by the President to suspend the writ of habeas corpus at any point on the military line between Philadelphia and Washington. This assertion by the Executive of an absolute control over the civil rights of the individual in regions not in insurrection excited rather more criticism than the measures which would unpleasantly affect only the rebellious States. A case was promptly brought before Chief Justice Taney for judicial interpretation. Justice Taney's opinion took strong ground [in the case of John Merryman] against the constitutionality of the President's act.

* * * * * * *

The position of the Executive in this matter was entirely consistent with that assumed in the establishment of the blockade. Granting the right in the President to decide when war has technically begun, both the powers in question spring naturally from the recognized authority of the Commander in Chief. In the interval between April 12 and July 4, 1861, a new principle thus appeared in the constitutional system of the United States, namely, that of a temporary dictatorship. All the powers of government were virtually concentrated in a single department, and that the department whose energies were directed by the will of a single man.

The [President's] proclamation of September 24, 1862 [in relation to civil rights in the North], constituted a perfect platform for a military despotism. Opposition [to the Government's emancipation and draft policies] * * * only tended to make military arrests more frequent.

[Quoted from: Dunning, W. A., Essays, etc., pp. 50–51.]

Mr. Lincoln gave as his authority for the [emancipation] proclamation "the power in me vested as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, in time of actual armed rebellion against the authority and Government of the United States"; and he described the act as "a fit and necessary war measure for suppressing said rebellion," and as "warranted by the Constitution upon military necessity." These expressions give to the paper the character of a military decree pure and simple.

The [House] Judiciary Committee sustained the Postmaster General [Blair], and * * * the precedent of the Government in Civil War is, therefore, that this part of the Constitution may be suspended by order of the administration when in the judgment of the President the public safety demands it.

TEMPORARY GOVERNMENTS CONSEQUENT UPON WAR WITH SPAIN.

[Quoted from. Taft, Wm. H., The Presidency, pp. 92–93.]

There is a far wider exercise of the authority by the Executive in his capacity as Commander in Chief than in the cases cited [Dorr's Rebellion and the Chicago strike]. It was exemplified in and after the Spanish War. Before and after the treaty of Paris was made with Spain, by which there were left in our possession as owners the Philippines and Porto Rico, and in our custody as trustees for the people of Cuba the island of Cuba, we acquired responsibilities which were met by occupation of those islands with the Army and Navy. In the case of Cuba this continued from 1898 until 1903, when the island was turned over to the Cuban Republic. In the case of Porto Rico this continued from 1898 until the taking effect of the Foraker Act, in April, 1900, and in the Philippines from August 13, 1898, when we took Manila, until March, 1902, when the President was expressly given power to establish a civil government there. During all this interval of congressional silent acquiescence in the action of the President as Commander in Chief, he directly, or through his agents appointed, exercised all the executive power and all the legislative power, and created all the judicial power of government in those territories. After suppressing actual disorder he created a quasi-civil government, and appointed an executive, a civil legislature, and civil judges, and became the lawgiver of 10,000,000 people for a period ranging from two years to four. Now, there was nothing new or startling in the principle of this temporary enlargement of his executive functions. Its novelty was in the great volume of power which the circumstances thrust on him and the responsibilities and the wide discretion which he had to exercise.

PROTECTION OF PANAMA SECESSIONISTS.

[Quoted from: Peck, Harry Thurston, Twenty Years of the Republic, p. 702.]

At this juncture [when the Hay-Herran treaty was pending, with poor prospects in the Colombian Senate] the State of Panama, incensed by the sacrifice of its commercial interests, seceded from Colombia and established a provisional government of its own, appealing to the United States for recognition. President Roosevelt within three days acknowledged the independence of the Republic of Panama. Physical conditions prevented Colombia from sending troops to Panama by land to coerce the seceding State, and American vessels of war at once appeared in Central American waters and began to cruise up and down the coast. Marines were landed on the Isthmus, and the Colombian Government was informed that the United States would permit no fighting there. France and England almost at once gave their recognition to the new Republic. Colombia then, when it was too late, offered every possible concession, but the offer was rejected. M. Bunau-Varilla, a Franco-Spanish engineer, was by cable accredited as Panama's representative at Washington, and on November 18 he and Secretary Hay signed a treaty by which the Republic of Panama granted to the United States the privilege of constructing a canal in return for $10,000,000 and a guarantee of Panama's independence. To the United States was also given control of a belt of land 10 miles wide through which the canal was to be cut. The provisional government of Panama ratified this treaty on December 2, and it was approved by the United States Senate on February 23, 1904, only 14 votes being cast against it.

Fearing that the Legislature of Maryland, which was to convene in September, would pass an ordinance of secession, the Secretary of War ordered the arrest of all or any part of its members and several citizens of Baltimore, if necessary, to prevent such action. Under this order Gen. Dix apprehended 10 members elect of the legislature, the mayor of Baltimore, a Congressman, and 2 editors; and at Frederick City, the meeting place of the legislature, Gen. Banks laid hold of "nine secession members." These men were subsequently confined in Fort Lafayette, N. Y., and in Fort Warren, Boston, where other State prisoners arrested in Kentucky and Missouri were also incarcerated. That these arrests were infractions of the Constitution need not for a moment be questioned. They were made on simple orders from the executive departments instead of on the proper warrants required by law. The prisoners were charged with no offense, were brought before no magistrate for examination, and the commandants of the military prisons were instructed to disregard any writ of habeas corpus issued in their behalf. Nevertheless, it would, it seems to me, be historical hypercriticism to find fault with the Federal Government for its exercise of these extraordinary powers in the border States.

[Quoted from: Rhodes, James Ford, History, etc., vol. 4, p. 413.]

A story about Seward, made up apparently out of whole cloth, became an effective illustration of the argument [that the cause of Vallandigham and others similarly arrested was the cause of civil liberty]. "My Lord," he was reported to have said to Lord Lyons, "I can touch a bell on my right hand and order the arrest of a citizen of Ohio; I can touch a bell again and order the imprisonment of a citizen of New York; and no power on earth except that of the President can release them. Can the Queen of England do so much?" That this story, by dint of iteration and, in spite of denials, by reiteration with circumstantial details, came to be thoroughly believed, is not strange, for, while Seward probably made no such remark, he and Stanton had caused many arrests with no more formality than a telegraphic dispatch.

It might be of interest to note that, under President Lincoln, through his Secretary of State, he issued, among other drastic orders, the following:

DECEMBER 17, 1864.

The President directs that, except immigrant passengers directly entering an American port by sea, henceforth no traveler shall be allowed to enter the United States from a foreign country without a passport. If a citizen, the passport must be from this department or from some United States minister or consul abroad; and if an alien, from the competent authority of his own country, the passport to be countersigned by a diplomatic agent or consul of the United States. This regulation is intended to apply especially to persons proposing to come to the United States from the neighboring British Provinces. Its observance will be strictly enforced by all officers, civil, military, and naval, in the service of the United States, and the State and municipal authorities are requested to aid in its execution. It is expected, however, that no immigrant passenger coming in manner aforesaid will be obstructed, or any other persons who may set out on their way hither before intelligence of this regulation could reasonably be expected to reach the country from which they may have started.

MARCH 14, 1865.

The President directs that all persons who now are or hereafter shall be found within the United States who have been engaged in holding intercourse or trade with the insurgents by sea, if they are citizens of the United States or domiciled aliens, shall be arrested and held as prisoners of war until the war shall close, subject, nevertheless, to prosecution, trial, and conviction for any offense committed by them as spies or otherwise against the laws of war. The President further directs that all nonresident foreigners who now are or hereafter shall be found in the United States, and who have been or shall have been engaged in violating the blockade of the insurgent ports, shall leave the United States within 12 days from the publication of this order, or from their subsequent arrival in the United States, if on the Atlantic side, and 40 days if on the Pacific side, of the country; and such persons shall not return to the United States during the continuance of the war. Provost marshals and marshals of the United States will arrest and commit to military custody all such offenders as shall disregard this order, whether they have passports or not, and they will be detained in such custody until the end of the war, or until discharged by subsequent orders of the President.

It has always been conceded by authorities on constitutional law that the President could not extradite citizens of a foreign country without provisions of law enacted by Congress, but President Lincoln, during the emergency that then existed in 1864, surrendered Arguelles to Spain. (Willoughby, p. 164.)

The Constitution, of course, vests in Congress certain specific war powers, which I do not undertake to discuss at this time; but will say in passing that Congress, in the discharge of its war powers granted under the Constitution, must exercise its own judgment and discretion, and can not shift its responsibility to the people of the Republic for the enactment of legislation upon subjects wholly within its province by saying it was requested by some department head. If Congress shall fail to exercise its own judgment and will, then it will not have the respect of the coordinate branch of the Government nor of the people of the Nation. Congress at this moment prefers to err in granting requested legislation rather than fail to pass sufficient legislation to quickly subdue our foes.

Up to this hour, upon the whole, it can with truth be said of the Sixty-fifth Congress that it has acted in unanimity with the President as Commander in Chief in seeking to destroy our enemies abroad and at home and to preserve the liberty of mankind as a heritage to all the world. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE].

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, what is the nature and object of the bill which Congress has under consideration, widely known as the Overman bill, and which some distinguished legislators regard as dangerous to the liberties of the country? By title it is called:

A bill authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, or offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government.

The objects are stated in the first section of the bill to be as follows:

That for the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, for the better utilization of resources and industries, and for the more effective exercise and more efficient administration by the President of his powers as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces, the President is hereby authorized to make such redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary, including any functions, duties, and powers hitherto by law conferred upon any executive department, commission, bureau, agency, office, or officer, in such manner as in his judgment shall seem best fitted to carry out the purposes of this act—

Then follows the method by which the objects are to be attained—and to this end [the President] is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as he may deem necessary.

These are the essential features of the proposed legislation. There is a limit fixed for the life of the law of one year after the termination of the war by the proclamation of the treaty of peace, or at such earlier time during the said year that the President may designate.

The remainder of the bill is in the nature of amplification of the details of powers conferred in the first section, together with administrative provisions.

What has been the most prolific source of criticism of the conduct of the war during the past year? It has been a lack of coordination between the various departments of the Government, the various powerful bodies and commissions. Each was going ahead along its own lines and more or less without reference to the effect of its activities upon other agencies of the Government. Often different departments were bidding for supplies against each other, while our allies in the great war were also bidding in the same markets for the same articles.

Our transportation interests, both by sea and rail; our manufacturing and mining interests of steel and coal and of all other things entering into the agencies of war; the food supply—all were being operated without reference to each other and without reference to the necessities and effectiveness of successfully conducting the war.

This intolerable condition was the cause of incalculable loss of valuable time and resources. There was a loud outcry throughout the country in the press and on the floors of Congress at the lack of coordination. It was pointed out that in Great Britain and other ally countries there was some sort of central authority that exercised a general supervision of all departments of war activity, and thus prevented working at cross purposes and waste of money and energy.

The result of this agitation for coordination was the introduction in another branch of Congress of a bill creating a war cabinet intended to correct this flagrant difficulty. I refer to the bill S. 3583, introduced by the Senator from Oregon, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Its title is as follows:

A bill to establish a war cabinet, and to define the jurisdiction and authority thereof.

This war cabinet was to be composed of "three distinguished citizens of demonstrated executive ability, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The jurisdiction and authority of the war cabinet is set forth as follows:

(a) To consider, devise, and formulate plans and policies, general and special, for the effectual conduct and vigorous prosecution of the existing war and, in the manner hereinafter prescribed, to direct and procure the execution of the same.

(b) To supervise, coordinate, direct, and control the functions and agencies of the Government in so far as in the judgment of the War Cabinet it may be necessary or advisable so to do for the effectual conduct and vigorous prosecution of the existing war.

(c) To consider and determine, upon its own motion or upon submission to it, subject to review by the President, all differences and questions relating to the conduct and prosecution of the war that may arise between any such departments, officials, and agencies of the Government.

(d) To require information from and utilize the services of any or all executive departments and executive officers or agents of the United States and of the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia necessary or helpful in the proper performance of the duties of said War Cabinet.

(e) In the exercise of the jurisdiction and authority hereby conferred to make, subject to review by the President, the necessary orders to any such department, bureau, official, or agency of the Government, and such decisions as the matters under consideration may require or warrant.

(f) To make rules and regulations governing its own procedure.

There was also introduced into another branch of the Congress a bill to create a department of munitions, intended to confer central authority upon a secretary of munitions of every branch and feature of the production of munitions. The following definition was given of the word "munitions" for the purposes of the act.

For the purposes of this act, such munitions shall be held and considered to be arms, munition, food, clothing, equipment, tentage and other shelter, means of transportation, and any other materials or instrumentalities that the President, in furtherance of the purposes of this act, shall designate as munitions of war.

The bill was entitled "A bill to increase and expedite the supply of munitions of war," and its purpose was described in the first section as follows:

That during the continuance of the present war and for not more than one year after the end thereof there shall be at the seat of government an executive department to be known as the department of munitions and a head thereof who shall be known as the secretary of munitions and who, under the President, shall have and shall exercise, either directly or through any other agents or agencies of the Government that the President may designate for the purpose, full power to provide for, supervise, and control the procurement, manufacture, and distribution of munitions of war.

I shall have occasion to refer to the second section of this bill later in my remarks. It is as follows:

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby empowered, in his discretion, to transfer to the secretary of munitions the whole or any part of any funds, records, and other public property that are now or shall hereafter be in the possession of, or available for the use of, any other agents or agencies of the Government in relation to munitions of war; also to make a like transfer of any powers or duties now vested or imposed, by statute or otherwise, in or upon such agents or agencies in relation to such munitions; also to assign persons in the civil, military, or naval service of the United States to temporary duty under the secretary of munitions. Any records, remaining funds, other property, powers, and duties transferred to the secretary of munitions from any source may be transferred back to that source by the President whenever he shall determine that such action is necessary.

Both of these bills were introduced into Congress by the distinguished chairman of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs, Senator CHAMBERLAIN, of Oregon. They received a great amount of attention at the hands of the press, and were widely discussed and commended among thoughtful men in and out of Congress as being intended to bring about a concentration and unity of effort in production of war munitions and necessaries for the successful conduct of the war.

It was known that Great Britain and other countries in alliance with ourselves had created a ministry of munitions and a war board with functions similar in character to those which were created in these two bills, and that they had worked out advantageously. I believe that with safety it can be said that a very large majority of the two branches of Congress recognized the lack of coordination between the various departments and agencies having to do with the war. It was impossible for a Member or Senator in the daily intercourse with these departments in the performance of his duties to fail to be impressed with that weak link in our governmental machinery. Everyone recognized that something ought to be done to bring about better teamwork. These two bills seemed to give fair promise of strengthening the weakest member of our line of national defense.

Now, I do not think that these bills were in any way intended to embarrass the President or to curtail his power. The members of the war cabinet were to be appointed by the President, to be sure, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. That can hardly be considered a restriction, however, as all the members of the Cabinet are appointed under the same conditions. The secretary of munitions also was to be appointed by the President. Notwithstanding this method of appointment, which was altogether in the hands of the Chief Magistrate, the President did not favor these two bills, and had no hesitation in letting his views on the subject be known.

On February 6 of the present year the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] introduced into the Senate the bill known as the Overman bill, which we have under consideration at this time, which bill is understood to have the full approval of the President.

A comparison of the objects in view in the proposed legislation, as stated respectively in the Chamberlain and the Overman bills, will show that they are not essentially different. They are, in short, to produce unity of purpose and coordination by conferring a general and specific authority over all departments having to do with the war, such departments now being independent of each other. Their accountability to the President is so attenuated that to all intents and purposes they are independent of any outside authority.

While the objects desired to be obtained are the same, the methods proposed are quite different. The Overman bill proposes no war cabinet and no department of munitions. In a very direct way it authorizes the President to "make such a redistribution of functions among executive agencies as he may deem necessary" for the more effective exercise and more efficient administration of his power as Commander in Chief of the land and naval forces. This authority is limited to the period of the war and one year thereafter.

It is objected to this proposed enactment that it confers too great powers upon the President; that in authorizing the President to redistribute functions among executive agencies—that is, to transfer powers conferred by law upon one department to another department or agency—is a surrender of legislative functions by Congress in favor of the Executive and thus unconstitutional.

A very high constitutional authority in another body stated that under this law it would be feasible for the President to transfer the powers of the Supreme Court of the United States from that body to any other governmental agency, and instanced the postmaster of the city of Washington.

Another high constitutional authority replied that if such transfer of powers should be made, the function of the office so transferred would have to be exercised in accordance with the existing laws governing such office and functions.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the especial attention of the membership of the House to the fact that the authorization of the President to transfer functions from one department or governmental agency to another, which is the principal objection to the Overman bill, is not confined to that bill. Section 2 of the munitions-department bill, which had the support of most of us, which I have heretofore quoted, empowered the President to transfer to the department of munitions any funds, records, or other property now in possession of other agencies of the Government, and also "to make a like transfer of any powers or duties now vested or imposed, by statute or otherwise, in or upon such agents or agencies in relation to such munitions." It would thus appear that the transfer of powers was deemed as essential to teamwork—coordination—in the Chamberlain bill as it is in the Overman bill.

I am not a lawyer, but I am fully conscious of the value of constitutional guaranties and of the great dangers of autocratic power. In normal times of peace no such enactment as this would receive a moment's consideration at my hands as a legislator. But these are not normal times. We are engaged as a Nation in a life-and-death struggle with the supreme foe of the democracies of the world. We are in the position of a man who must have an operation performed, or a number of operations, to save his life. Of course, the man does not submit to those operations voluntarily and willingly. He hates and abhors them precisely as we hate and abhor the necessary application of the surgeon's knife to our national life and institutions. We hate to vote for laws that permit rude interference with our national customs, our liberty to travel when and where we please, our liberty to eat such food as we prefer, to sell or hold our crops, and to put an arbitrary price upon products. We hate to vote heavy taxes and burdensome bonds upon the future. Still more, we hate to vote for laws to take from their homes our young men and send them to the scenes of bloody conflict in Europe. But we know that these things are necessary to the continued life and liberty of our beloved country, and, realizing the full force of our acts, we unhesitatingly vote for all these things, basing our votes upon such measure of wisdom and justice as God has conferred upon us.

Assuming that under the terms of this bill the President would have authority to transfer the powers of the Supreme Court to the postmaster of Washington, what reason is there to think that he would do that or any other ridiculous act under the law? What reason is there to suppose that he would disturb the orderly working of the Interstate Commerce Commission or any other of the agencies of government not connected with the war or its necessities? It is conceivable that the Interstate Commerce Commission might come within that category; and if it did, why should not the power be exercised? Concentration of power we must have. In whose hands could it more properly and safely be placed than in those of the President of the United States and the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy? That the President is human is to say that he is not infallible. He is not a superman. There are no supermen. But he is the President of the United States, elected by the people. He is President at a time in our history when God in His providence has seen fit to lay his hand upon us in the affliction of a terrible war. As a historian none of our writers have ever written more clearly and eloquently upon the dangers of autocratic power in the hands of the head of a nation. Is it conceivable that Wilson the President and Commander in Chief has forgotten the principles and teachings of Wilson the scholar, the educator, the historian, and the statesman? No! Being human and a devoted partisan, he may occasionally make a slip, as he did a short time ago with reference to a distinguished Member of this House, now transferred to another branch of the National Legislature. But the people understand this and quickly correct the errors of temperament.

The President is a great American, of high ideals, and devoted to his country. He may be trusted to conscientiously exercise these great powers. Most of us thought well of the Chamberlain bills. He did not. He practically said, "You have given me this job. Do not set the rules by which I am to work it out. Let me do the job my own way." Is not that what almost anyone of us would have desired? I am in favor of letting the President work this job out in his own way.

There are some who would deny the President the authority conferred by this bill on the ground that he sometimes makes mistakes in his choice and judgment of men. He has chosen a great many men for important positions in the public service connected with the war. Some of them have not proven successes. But it is to be remembered that to measure up to the requirements of a great war is a terribly severe test—the real "acid test." So great a man as Abraham Lincoln chose many men in the earlier stages of the Civil War who proved utter failures. The several commanders of the Army of the Potomac followed each other in failure for more than two years, until Meade won the battle of Gettysburg. From that time on to the end of the war Lincoln made few errors in the choice of men. Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan all attracted the attention of the great emancipator, and all to-day live with him in the deathless realms of immortality.

Thus would I have it with our President of to-day, our Commander in Chief in a war on a vastly greater scale than that of the sixties, and involving consequences of as great import to the future of our country. I could wish that our President had followed the course of his immortal predecessor, or that he might yet fellow that course, and rally one more great resource of the country into the awful struggle. Lincoln called into his immediate councils some of the great leaders who had been in political antagonism to him prior to his election as President. They were patriots before partisans, and Stanton, the great War Secretary, and others, accepted the call.

If the President could see his way to place in his Cabinet some of the great men and trusted statesmen of the Republican Party, he would remove one of the obstacles to the verdict of history as to his own real greatness. Sentiment is a wonderful lever on public thought and action. I would not have a single Democratic officeholder removed from Maine to California during the term of the present administration. But if the President were to invite to seats in his Cabinet councils one or more of such of the minority party as William Howard Taft, Theodore Roosevelt, Charles Evans Hughes, HENRY CABOT LODGE, JOSEPH G. CANNON, or others of similar worth and character, it would be the equivalent of a great additional army in unifying and coordinating our efforts, and would securely place the name of Woodrow Wilson on the shaft of imperishable and immortal fame as a true patriot above all his other strong claims to distinction.

If, however, the President shall continue mainly to confine his councils to the members of his own political party, I shall make no complaint or criticism, and hope that his selections of such counselors may always be best for his own fame and for the good of our dear country. He will have my unqualified support, and he will have the support of the great Republican Party without stint or measure in the great work of prosecuting the war for the defense of America and the freedom and democracy of the world.

Mr. Speaker, holding these views, and without in any way compromising the dignity of the Congress by voting to confer these great powers on the Executive for the period of the war, I shall unhesitatingly cast my vote for the pending Overman bill as desired by the President and Commander in Chief. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, while we are waiting for a moment, I would like to see if we can get some understanding what procedure we will follow after general debate is exhausted on the bill. I realize that there is no such thing as the five-minute rule in the House, and yet I feel bound in good faith to agree to let gentlemen, who have amendments to this bill, offer them, and I would like if we can get some understanding as to what time we are going to have on each amendment so there will be no ill feeling when we come to it to-morrow.

Mr. GILLETT. Why does not the gentleman ask unanimous consent that debate on amendments be under the five-minute rule?

Mr. GARNER. That will not do.

Mr. GILLETT. Why not?

Mr. GARNER. Because we tried to get to consider this bill to-day under the five-minute rule in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and the gentleman objected to that and we are considering it in the House.

Mr. GILLETT. But we can agree that amendments be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GARNER. But in the House, as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, you have got to keep 220 Members here as a quorum, whereas if we had gone into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union under the five-minute rule we would only have required 100 Members for a quorum.

Mr. GILLETT. How does that affect debate under the five-minute rule in the House?

Mr. GARNER. It affects it to the extent that in one case you have to have 100 Members and in the other case you have to have 220 for a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, there have been 220 here all the afternoon.

Mr. GARNER. Can not we make some agreement as to offering one or two or three amendments and then move the previous question on all amendments and the bill to final passage?

Mr. STAFFORD. What objection is there to the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts that this bill be considered for amendment by sections under the five-minute rule?

Mr KITCHIN. I suggest the gentleman from North Carolina ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union——

Mr. GILLETT. I should not care to agree to that, because there is this distinction, in the House you have the right to a roll call on each amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman would under this.

Mr. GILLETT. Not if you are considering it in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. KITCHIN. It would be considered as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman means by that to shut off a roll call——

Mr. KITCHIN. You can not shut off the roll call by that.

Mr. GILLETT. Then I should have no objection.

Mr. KITCHIN. I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KITCHIN. When you consider a bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union any person is entitled to demand the yeas and nays, and if one-fifth of the Members present are in favor of demanding the yeas and nays there must be a roll call. must there not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair's recollection is that that rule applied to bills that were on the Union Calendar that were considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole, but as to the bills that were on the House Calendar, the Chair's recollection is not clear about.

Mr. KITCHIN. Suppose we get unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole? That carries with it, certainly, the right to a roll call.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, there is not the slightest disposition, when I speak of a roll call, to filibuster. I do not think there is the slightest disposition on this side to do that, and we will not want any roll call on the amendment.

Mr. GARNER. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman from Massachusetts. I have no desire to object to considering the bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule, except I want the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] to reserve his right to move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage at some stage of the procedure. Why does not the gentleman ask, if he knows just exactly the number of amendments that are wanted to be offered——

Mr. GILLETT. I do not.

Mr. GARNER. And say, for instance, that half a dozen may be offered?

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman realizes that the orderly procedure will be to take up the bill by sections, as suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GARNER. At what time would the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] be able to move the previous question?

Mr. STAFFORD. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill.

Mr. GARNER. That might be a week from now.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think this, that if the unanimous consent, as suggested by me, was granted the gentleman from North Carolina, or any other gentleman, if he got the floor, could demand the previous question at any time. But they would hardly do it, and I have never known it to be done when we were working in the House as if it were in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute debate. But he still would have that power. As I understand, under such unanimous-consent agreement as I suggested you could read the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. GILLETT. Section by section?

Mr. KITCHIN. And no general debate. You could read it, and the Members could offer the amendments just as if we were in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but if any division occurred a roll call could be demanded. Another privilege which a Member could have when he got the time and was recognized would be that he could demand the previous question and cut off all amendments. It is a question as to whether or not the House would give it, of course.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the Chair may be permitted to make a statement, this is a somewhat peculiar situation. It is the first time in the recollection of the Chair that general debate has been agreed upon on a bill that is on the House Calendar.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the Chair permit me, in that particular——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the Chair might be permitted to suggest, there is considerable time left under general debate, as agreed upon. There could be an agreement whereby gentlemen could offer their amendments during the time of general debate and speak to their amendments or the bill. It would seem to simplify the situation.

Mr. WEBB. If that could be agreed to, Mr. Speaker, I would be willing to extend the time for the general debate an hour or two.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman realize that the more orderly procedure would be to have the bill considered section by section and have the amendments offered as suggested and have the debate limited and amendments voted on?

Mr. WEBB. That is the way in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STAFFORD. After the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] obtained unanimous consent to have this bill considered it was the understanding that there would be a liberal debate, not only general debate, but also liberal debate on and opportunity offered for amendment? It is only the carrying out the understanding of the House to follow the suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not see any inclination upon the part of the Members on this side of the aisle to filibuster.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Not a bit.

Mr. KITCHIN. And I am sure that there is no intent or purpose, if we have the unanimous-consent agreement—that is, in the mind of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] or any other gentleman on this side—to demand the previous question. Of course, he can control the situation if he sees that the Members on that side are just simply filibustering. Then, of course, he would demand it.

Mr. GILLETT. I would not blame him under those circumstances. On the other hand, we want the right to discuss amendments freely, as was understood, and it seems to me, under the five-minute rule. It is limiting debate very emphatically. But that is the understanding I had this morning when we agreed upon the general debate. I understood it was not expressed in it, but it was the implied understanding, that after that we were to agree to take up the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I think it is fair to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] to say that is about the understanding he gave this morning.

Mr. WEBB. That is what I wanted. I am trying now to arrange a procedure by which that very thing can be carried out.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. The trouble of it is we are trying to operate under the five-minute rule in the House, when there is no provision for that sort of thing in the House.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have not heard of more than two or three amendments. I have one that I want to offer. That would not take more than five minutes, so far as I am concerned. I do not know as to other gentlemen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from North Carolina would yield the floor for an amendment, he would lose, of course, control of the floor under the general rules of the House.

Mr. GARNER. Mr Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. If the House should agree to the unanimous-consent request made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] that we consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole and read the bill by paragraphs under the five-minute rule, would the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], at any time he saw proper, have the right to get the floor and move the previous question on the bill and amendments? Would that be in order?

Mr. WEBB. Before finishing the reading?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. I do not think so.

Mr. GILLETT. I think we ought to read the bill. Then why not agree to it?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I make a suggestion to the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. KITCHIN, and the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. WEBB? Why not set an hour to-morrow at which we will take a vote on all amendments and the bill on final passage?

Mr. GILLETT. We will not know how much time we will want.

Mr. STAFFORD. Some conference reports may be presented that will require time and some amendments may be offered. Let us carry out the original intention for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Will it be a public calamity if the bill is not passed to-morrow before adjournment?

Mr. WEBB. Well, I am anxious to expedite the passage of the bill just as the gentleman is.

Mr. GILLETT. Why not agree that the bill shall be read section by section, and that amendments be allowed to each section, and have a five-minute debate on each, and at the end of the reading order the previous question?

Mr. GARNER. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that there ought to be opportunity given to amend the bill, although I will confess that if I were in control of the bill I would move the previous question. But I am not in control of the bill. If one-fifth of the membership of the House, enough to call for the yeas and nays, should see proper to filibuster, you could not pass this bill in a week to save your life, because you could get a roll call on every amendment.

Mr. KITCHIN. The gentleman from North Carolina would then have the right to move the previous question.

Mr. GARNER. He would not have the right under this rule to move the previous question. But the Committee on Rules could then bring in a rule and do away with it.

Mr. GILLETT. There is no disposition, I will say, on this side to delay the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the Chair may be permitted to make a suggestion, it seems there should be no great disagreement. It seems to the Chair that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] being thoroughly agreed as to what they desire, should be able to get together between now and morning and draw up a proposition and submit it for unanimous consent. That would obtain the exact end that it is desired to attain. If you attempt to do it now by unanimous consent, it confuses the matter under the general rules of the House.

Mr. WEBB. I think we are pretty well agreed upon what we want to do. I ask unanimous consent that when the general debate is exhausted on the bill we shall consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule, and at the end of that consideration the previous question on the bill shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. KITCHIN. At the end of the reading of the bill under the five-minute rule?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. I will say that I want fair discussion on any amendment, but if there is any disposition to filibuster I want to use any right that is given to me by the rules. But I am sure that will not be necessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent that when the general debate shall have been concluded the bill shall be read for amendment——

Mr. KITCHIN. By sections——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And that there shall be applied to it what is known as the five-minute rule, and that at the end of the reading for amendment under the five-minute rule the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEBB. During the discussion of the bill under the five-minute rule—I ask the Speaker the question if it would be in order, in case the necessity arises, to move the previous question?

The SPEAKER. Whenever the gentleman from North Carolina yields the floor for purposes of amendment he yields the floor for all purposes, and loses control of the floor. If he should get recognition at any time, of course, he would still have the floor.

Mr. WEBB. I am willing to stay here a whole week and debate the bill and consider amendments to it, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. GILLETT. All we want is an opportunity to have the amendments considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There was no objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina, and that order is made.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business of Calendar Wednesday for this week, Wednesday, be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the Calendar Wednesday business upon next Wednesday be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, what committee have the call?

Mr. KITCHIN. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and they do not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

GEORGE CREEL.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachutts asks unanimous consent to speak for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I call the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], who is the leader of the House, and so probably more than anyone else responsible for its dignity, to a sentence from a speech by Mr. George Creel, who holds an important Government position under this administration, made in New York yesterday. In the course of his speech the question was asked him:

What is a loyal heart? Have all the Members of Congress loyal hearts?

Mr. Creel responded:

I don't like slumming, so I won't explore into the hearts of Congress.

I think it is not improper to bring that to the attention of the leader of the House for his opinion or action.

Mr. KITCHIN. I do not know that my opinion will be worth anything. I should like to know what paper the gentleman is reading from.

Mr. GILLETT. The New York World of this morning.

Mr. KITCHIN. With all respect to the New York World, I would rather see that verified by Mr. Creel or somebody else, rather than take what the New York World says about it. In my experience in reading the New York World I have found that it is most difficult for that paper to state the exact facts about anything. [Applause.] But I would say this, that if Mr. Creel or anybody else at the head of any responsible bureau, or department, or commission under this Government made any such statement, or has any such opinion of Congress, then he is not worthy the respect of any Member of this House, or of any patriotic or decent citizen of the United States. [Applause.]

INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma presented the conference report on the bill H. R. 8696, which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD under the rule.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, May 14, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

TUESDAY, May 14, 1918.

(Legislative day of Monday, May 13, 1918.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting supplemental estimates of appropriation in the sum of $275,000 required by the District of Columbia for such additional services, improvements, maintenance, and repairs as may be urgently needed, due to the existing war, for the fiscal year 1919, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

THE CALENDAR—AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Out of order, I wish to introduce a resolution for an amendment to the rules, pursuant to the notice I gave yesterday. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The resolution (S. Res. 242) was referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That paragraph 3 of Rule VII of the Standing Rules of the Senate be amended as follows:

In line 2 strike out the words "or until the hour of 1 o'clock" and in lieu thereof insert "and until the hour of 2 o'clock," so that the paragraph as amended would read as follows:

"3 Until the morning business shall have been concluded, and so announced from the chair, and until the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, no motion to proceed to the consideration of any bill, resolution, report of a committee, or other subject upon the calendar shall be entertained by the Presiding Officer unless by unanimous consent; and if such consent be given, the motion shall not be subject to amendment, and shall be decided without debate upon the merits of the subject proposed to be taken up."

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Gulon	Nelson	Shields
Beckham	Hale	New	Simmons
Brandegee	Harding	Norris	Smoot
Calder	Hardwick	Nugent	Sterling
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Sutherland
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Page	Thomas
Culberson	Kellogg	Phelan	Thompson
Cummins	Kenyon	Poindexter	Townsend
Curtis	King	Pomerene	Trammell
Dillingham	Kirby	Ransdell	Vardaman
Fall	Knox	Robinson	Walsh
Fernald	Lenroot	Saulsbury	Watson
Fletcher	Lodge	Shafroth	Weeks
France	McKellar	Sheppard	Wilfley
Gallinger	McNary	Sherman	Williams

Mr. OVERMAN. I announce that the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] and the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] are detained on official business.

Mr. BECKHAM. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained by illness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], on page 17, to strike out the paragraph as amended. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, beginning with line 7, it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the paragraph as amended, or the following words:

That out of this appropriation the Postmaster General is authorized to expend not exceeding $100,000 for the purchase, operation, and maintenance of aeroplanes for an experimental aeroplane mail service between such points as he may determine: Provided further, That the Postmaster General, in his discretion, may fix the amount of postage on mail carried by aeroplane at not exceeding 24 cents an ounce or fraction thereof.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I understand the proviso is included in the motion to amend. I have not a word to say on this subject. I have said all I care to say, and I am ready to vote, as far as I am concerned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion to strike out. [Putting the question.] The Chair can not decide a vote of that kind. [Putting the question again.] It is as bad as it was before. Unless the yeas and nays are called for the Chair will call for a division. All in favor will rise.

There were, on a division—ayes 12, noes 13.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to strike out is lost.

Mr. KENYON. I ask for the yeas and nays if it is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair rules invariably that when there has been a division the yeas and nays can not be called. The Chair asked whether any Senator wanted the yeas and nays.

Mr. KENYON. What was the vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Twelve to thirteen. It can be renewed in the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. The vote indicates that there is no quorum present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is very true.

Mr. KENYON. Can the Senate vote without a quorum?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is going to stick to the ruling made many times, that the yeas and nays can not be called for after a division and announcement of decision.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry. Under what rule or what custom in legislative bodies are the yeas and nays denied because a division was asked?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under no custom, the Chair will answer the Senator from New Hampshire, except the custom of the present occupant, who has a number of times ruled that when the yeas and nays were not called for and there was a division and announcement of result, it was the consensus of opinion that the division settled the question, and that, in the opinion of the Chair, it was too late to call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish simply to add this word, that I have never known that custom to prevail in any legislative body I have had knowledge of, and it is an innovation, of course, on the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I simply want to make this observation: I can not consent to the justice of the ruling of the Chair or the reasonability of it. It seems to me when the Chair announced that 13 Senators vote one way and 12 another, making a total of 25, which is manifestly but half a quorum, such a vote as that ought to be declared to be void. As the Chair knows, there was no quorum voting. I do not think that ought to bind the Senate of the United States of America.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I am constrained to concur in the objection that is made to the ruling of the Chair. The demand for the yeas and nays is a constitutional right. It does not depend upon the rule of the Senate; it does not depend upon custom.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania answer the Chair this question: Is it a constitutional right after the Chair has announced the vote and it is decided?

Mr. KNOX. It seems to me it is a constitutional right of either House to have the yeas and nays entered upon the Journal. The provision of the Constitution is as follows:

> Each House shall keep a journal of its proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such parts as may in their judgment require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the Members of either House on any question shall, at the desire of one-fifth of those present, be entered on the Journal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Can the Senate vote on this question to-morrow? Some one rises to-morrow and says, "I would like to have the yeas and nays on the motion to strike out."

Mr. KNOX. It is to be done, of course, while the matter is before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not before the Senate when the Chair has decided it.

Mr. KNOX. Of course, I want to defer as far as I can to the judgment of the Chair, unless an exception is taken to it; but I think the Senate should be sustained in its right to have a vote by yeas and nays under the existing circumstances.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this particular case the Chair asked the Senate if any Senator desired the yeas and nays, and no Senator requested them.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was hardly the prerogative of the Chair to make an inquiry of that kind. I must dissent from the ruling of the Chair. I take an appeal from his ruling.

The VICE PRESIDENT. An appeal is taken from the ruling of the Chair. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I shall vote to sustain the ruling of the Chair, and I shall vote that way because the call for the yeas and nays was not made until after the vote had been taken and the result announced by the Chair. It occurs to me that that has finally disposed of the question.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator allow me a question? Suppose in place of a division the Chair had announced the result of a viva voce vote, would not the right to call for the yeas and nays then have been in order?

Mr. WALSH. I do not so understand the rule. When would it end? We take a viva voce vote to-day and the Chair announces that the motion is carried. Am I to understand the Senator from New Hampshire to assert that to-morrow some Senator may come in and make a demand for the yeas and nays?

Mr. GALLINGER. No, I do not so contend; but I do contend if the Chair had taken a viva voce vote and declared that the ayes had it or the noes had it it would not have settled it any more than a division, and it will be settled when the constitutional provision is complied with, which is that we have a right to have the vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. WALSH. I inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire, so that we may understand it clearly, how much time must elapse between the announcement of the Chair and when a demand for the yeas and nays has actually been lost?

Mr. GALLINGER. It should be taken, I think, as in this instance, almost immediately.

Mr. WALSH. How long is "immediately"?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, well, that the Senator can decide as well as I; before another subject matter is taken up.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hale	Nelson	Simmons
Beckham	Harding	New	Smoot
Brandegee	Hardwick	Norris	Sterling
Calder	Hitchcock	Nugent	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Thomas
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Page	Thompson
Culberson	Kellogg	Phelan	Townsend
Cummins	Kenyon	Poindexter	Trammell
Curtis	King	Pomerene	Vardaman
Dillingham	Kirby	Ransdell	Wadsworth
Fall	Knox	Robinson	Walsh
Fletcher	Lenroot	Saulsbury	Weeks
France	Lodge	Shafroth	Willey
Gallinger	McKellar	Sheppard	Williams
Gronna	McNary	Sherman
Gulon	Martin	Shields

Mr. OVERMAN. I announce that the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] and the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] are detained on official business.

Mr. BECKHAM. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], is detained by illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The pending question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the ruling of the Senate? The ruling of the Chair is that after an announcement by the Chair of a decision it is too late for a Senator to call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I understood the further ruling of the Chair was that the Chair had heretofore made a ruling that when a division had been called for the yeas and nays were not thereafter in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has so decided three times since he has been here, and this is the first appeal which has been taken from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should merely like to call attention to the rule as laid down in Jefferson's Manual, at least to what seems to have been the opinion of Mr. Jefferson on this question. If I understand correctly what he says, as found on page 132 of the Senate Rules and Manual, it is to the effect that it is in order to demand the yeas and nays at any time before any new motion; and that I understand to mean any intervening business. Mr. Jefferson says:

> The affirmative and negative of the question having been both put and answered, the Speaker declares whether the yeas or nays have it by the sound, if he be himself satisfied, and it stands as the judgment of the House. But if he be not himself satisfied, which voice is the greater, or—> if before any other Member comes into the House, or before any new motion made (for it is too late after that) any Member shall rise and declare himself dissatisfied with the Speaker's decision, then the Speaker is to divide the House.

The disjunctive there is quite important—

Mr. GALLINGER. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the ruling of the Senate? [Putting the question.] The Chair does not know as to how he is going to decide that question either.

Mr. KENYON. Let us have the yeas and nays on that, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. Let us have the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent. I am paired with him for the day, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). Has the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is not present. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). May I inquire if the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Then I am compelled to withdraw my vote, having a pair with that Senator.

Mr. HARDING. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. In his absence I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CALDER (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. In his absence, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] is absent on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

So the decision of the Chair was overruled.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the request of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] for the yeas and nays seconded? [A pause.] It is. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when his name was called). On account of my general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARDING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and can arrange no transfer. Therefore I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). As I announced awhile ago, the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent for the day, and I am paired with him during the day. Therefore I withhold my vote. I shall allow this notice to stand for the remainder of the day.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair as heretofore, I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). Reannouncing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). As heretofore announced, I am paired with the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I am unable to arrange a transfer, and in his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as before as to my pair, and withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CALDER (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and in his absence withdraw my vote.

Mr. FALL (after having voted in the affirmative). I note the absence of the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], with whom I have a general pair. He requested me to observe the pair upon one of the amendments to this bill, and I presume that he is relying upon my observing it upon the others. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 32, as follows:

So Mr. KING's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before we pass from the subject upon which the vote was taken a few moments ago, I shall take the liberty of reading from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 19, 1914, page 10728, as follows:

Mr. ASHURST. I call for the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to the amendment of the committee. All in favor of the amendment will say "aye." [After a pause.]

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to move to table the amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If that is the purpose, the Chair will be compelled to rule that it is too late now.

Mr. OWEN. I do not insist upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All those opposed to the amendment to the amendment will say "no." [After a pause.] The Chair is unable to decide. All in favor of the amendment to the amendment will rise. [After a pause.] Those opposed will rise. [After a pause.] The amendment to the amendment is agreed to. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. GORE and Mr. OWEN called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senators can not call for the yeas and nays now, after the result of the vote has been announced.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, we could not have any way of knowing whether we have a quorum or not. I was trying to secure recognition before the result of the vote was announced, but I did not quite succeed in doing so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not believe the yeas and nays can now be called for. There was an opportunity for it and a division. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The Vice President made the same ruling on July 9, 1914. The record thereof will be found on page 11843 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on that point I will simply observe that I did not take an appeal from the ruling of the Vice President because I did not think it was important on those matters. I had it in mind to do so, but did not. The fact that the Senator from Utah reenforced the Vice President simply proves that two excellent men, who always mean to do right, made a mistake.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will look back in the RECORD prior to the date to which he has referred, he will find that the Vice President ruled exactly as he ruled on that day; and it was upon that ruling that I made the statement that I did.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the provision of the bill which provides for the acquisition of the pneumatic-tube service. I offer the amendment in order to perfect the text of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, at the end of line 7, in the committee amendment relative to the pneumatic-tube service, it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a colon and the following words:

Provided further, That the Postmaster General is authorized to enter into contracts, to comply with proper police regulations, for franchise or street rights for pneumatic-tube mail service in such cities.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I offer a second amendment to perfect the text.

Mr. KING. Does that relate to the pneumatic-tube service?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the committee amendment, on page 16, at the end of line 17, it is proposed to insert the following after the word "proper":

The expense of such investigation shall be paid out of any available funds appropriated for the use of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, this brings us to a consideration of the provision of the bill which deals with the pneumatic-tube service. It is not my purpose to detain the Senate very long in discussing this provision of the bill.

It will be recalled that the last Post Office appropriation bill contained a provision creating a joint commission, composed of three Members from the Senate to be appointed by the Vice President, and three from the House to be appointed by the Speaker. This joint commission of the two Houses were directed, by the provisions of the amendment inserted in the Post Office bill, to make a thorough and complete investigation of this question and to report the result of their observations and conclusions to the Congress.

When this joint commission was appointed I addressed a letter to the Postmaster General telling him of the appointment of the commission and asking him to detail an expert, one familiar with postal matters and postal regulations, to accompany the commission and to act as a representative of the department and as an adviser to the commission. The Postmaster General appointed a representative and stated in his letter that he had selected one of the most experienced men in the department and one in whom he had perfect confidence. That representative from the department accompanied the commission, I believe, to each of the tube cities and was present, in person or by representative, at every hearing that was conducted.

The commission have printed the results of their investigation. They have printed the report of the post-office experts who were appointed by the Postmaster General to investigate this question, and they have collated and printed and laid before the Senate every investigation that has been made and every report that has been filed by the Post Office Department or any of its representatives. It will be perfectly easy for Senators to ascertain what these reports are and what the conclusions reached have been, because the publication has been delivered to every Member of the Senate.

Mr. President, these pneumatic tubes have been in existence in five of the great cities of the country for practically 20 years and in some of them longer than 20 years. I believe that the best judges of the utility or usefulness of these tubes are the people in the cities that have been served by the tubes. I call attention to the fact that in these five cities practically one-third of the total revenues of the Post Office Department are collected.

It is true that these tubes were never intended to carry anything but first-class mail. They were not constructed to carry parcels. It was not deemed necessary, when they were constructed and put into operation, that they should carry anything but first-class mail, the character of mail that should be promptly handled and delivered, so that the business of the country may be properly conducted through the agency of the Post Office Department.

Mr. President, I think it is unfortunate that the Post Office Department has waged such a relentless war upon this tube system. The Postmaster General has declared that the tubes were useless, that he would not use them if they were given as a present, that they had no utility whatever and were of no service, and that he could supply the service and deliver the mail more economically and more rapidly—I am talking about first-class mail—by an automobile service than he can by the tube service.

Mr. President, it is known to all men that there are considerable lengths of time—from two to three months in each year—when automobiles can not be successfully operated in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, or St. Louis. It is impossible that they can be operated successfully because of the weather conditions. Freezing temperature, snow, and other interferences with the successful operation of automobiles put them out of business, and there are considerable lengths of time connecting themselves up together when the automobile service is an utter failure in these cities.

Another reason, to my mind, why automobile service ought not to be substituted for the tube service in these cities is that these tube cities have expended millions and hundreds of millions of dollars in an effort to get traffic off the surface. They have built underground railroads, they have built overhead railroads, and they have spent money without limit in an effort to relieve the congestion on the streets, for two purposes.

One is to facilitate the commerce that passes over the streets, and the other, and more important, perhaps, than all, is an effort on their part to save human life. The statistics show that hardly a day passes in the great city of New York when one or two or three or perhaps half a dozen men, women, or children are not run over and killed by automobile trucks. The fact developed in this investigation that one automobile truck conveying the mails created more confusion and congestion on the streets of New York and Philadelphia and Boston than a dozen ordinary automobiles operated in the commerce or travel of the city. The reason for that is that whenever an employee gets on an automobile carrying the United States mail he feels that he is the lord of all he surveys; that he has the right of way; that no ordinance or traffic regulation of the city applies to him, and that he can create all the confusion and all the congestion he pleases, and nobody dares interfere with him.

The proposition of the committee is, after seven months' investigation, that it is to the interest of the Government, that it is to the interest of the Postal Service and to the proper and rapid transmission of the mails, that the use of these tubes be continued, and that it be continued by having them taken over by the Government and operated under Government control and at Government expense. Your commission recommend that the price for their purchase be about the original cost of construction, according to the engineers' estimates of what that cost was; in other words, about four and a half million dollars. We recommend that this amount be paid in regular installments for 10 years, deducting each year an amount sufficient to pay the expenses of the operation of the tubes, and applying the balance to the liquidation of the debt. Under the plan submitted, in 10 years the Government will own the tubes and have them entirely paid for, and will thereafter operate them at their own expense and under their own direction.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I am not so much concerned about the purchase of these tubes as I am about the question of whether it is economy for the Government to use them. I have in my hand a copy of a letter addressed to the distinguished chairman of the committee, written by the Postmaster General, wherein he states that the cost of transmitting a letter by the tube system is 13½ cents. I want to ask the Senator what is the finding of this commission with reference to the cost of sending letters through the tube system?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, that suggestion is so ridiculous that it hardly seems to warrant a reply. Our investigation shows, after a number of tests, that you could carry a thousand letters through the tube for 11 cents, and to talk about it costing 13½ cents to deliver one letter through the tube is something I can not understand.

Mr. GRONNA. Then, as I understand the Senator——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Just wait a minute. Those estimates are sustained by Government experts and various former Postmasters General and postmasters of these cities. How the Postmaster General could have gotten it into his head, and where he got his information from, that it costs the Government 13½ cents to deliver a letter through the tube is something that I can not understand, to say the least.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will yield further, I do not wish to do the Postmaster General an injustice. He refers to a particular city.

Mr. BANKHEAD. He refers to the city of Philadelphia.

Mr. GRONNA. He refers to the city of Philadelphia. Of course, the Postmaster General is the head of that great department, and he is directly responsible for the affairs of that department. Personally, I am greatly confused about this matter. I know the distinguished chairman of this committee and the many excellent members of it have given the subject considerable attention, but I also know that the present Postmaster General is a student of these matters and that necessarily he must have given a great deal of attention to it. There are statements in this letter to the effect that it would be a detriment to the service rather than a help.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator will take the trouble and the time to read the report of the commission and the report of the experts who have investigated this very question, he himself will be unable perhaps to tell why or how the Postmaster General reached this conclusion. Our engineers whom we employed and who investigated this whole question and who were supposed to be the best in the country, state that if they could have continuous, uninterrupted automobile service, in their judgment the service could be rendered for something less than it costs by the tube, perhaps during the year $100,000 or $200,000; I do not remember the exact amount. But all that estimate was based upon conditions, and the conditions were continuous, uninterrupted service. The difference between the engineers and the department was as to what it would cost to maintain the service, for repairs, the cost of operating the automobiles, and all that.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. I regret to say that I have not found time to thoroughly investigate the report the Senator kindly sent me, and I am asking these questions merely for information.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am glad to answer any question that I can.

Mr. GRONNA. Can this proposed tube system be used for anything but letters?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No, sir; only for first-class mail—letters.

Mr. GRONNA. So that heavy transportation or transportation of second-class mail matter and packages will necessarily have to be carried on any way by automobiles or wagons.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think that is true, Mr. President; but there is no necessity perhaps for any great haste in the dispatch of parcel post. Delay does not involve any loss in business. The purpose of the tubes from the beginning until now has been to dispatch first-class mail, the business mail of the country, and divorce it from the heavier and slower moving mail, such as parcel post and heavy packages.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in connection with the question the Senator from North Dakota asked him, to what extent has the taking of first-class mail through the tube relieved the congestion that would have existed had the surface service been required to carry the first-class mail the same as the other? While I am asking that question I should like to state to the Senator the object I have in view. It seems to me there are two things involved in carrying this mail. One is to expedite the carriage of the first-class mail and the other is to relieve the congestion. Do the tubes accomplish both those objects, and in the latter case to what extent?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think both objects are accomplished. The Post Office Department tells us that 25,000,000 letters daily pass through these tubes. The Senator can imagine what the effect would be if that 25,000,000 letters were sent by the ordinary course of mail. Therefore it must relieve the congestion of mail to that extent. Nobody proposes to carry all the mail through the tubes. That would not be practicable. They were not constructed for that purpose.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator in regard to the statement made by the Postmaster General—what explanation he can make of his statement to the effect that "the tubes are unnecessary and a hindrance to efficient operation of the Postal Service. The volume of all classes of mail has so greatly increased and surface transportation so greatly improved, both as to speed and frequency, that the tubes are no longer of value"?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the Senator want to know what I think of that?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think it is true.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator does not agree to that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not agree to that.

Mr. FLETCHER. Some figures are given to sustain that position, and then another statement is made that—

Because of their limited capacity the tubes can not be used to meet emergent conditions, and for that reason delay millions of letters annually.

Does the Senator find the statement in that report that letters are delayed?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Nobody has claimed that any but first-class letters go through the tubes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that now it is proposed to use the subways.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; they are not in the subways at all.

Mr. FLETCHER. I say the proposal is to use the subways.

Mr. BANKHEAD. You will have to put tubes in the subways if you are going to use the subways for any character of mail.

Mr. FLETCHER. The statement is further made that the cost of transporting mail by tube is an extravagant waste of public funds. They claim that the cost is more expensive than by special delivery.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think that is true. I do not think the figures show it. I do not think their own experts show it. Let me read for just a moment what the Postmaster General says, and I call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to it. Here is what the Postmaster General states:

The cost of transporting mail by tubes is excessive and an extravagant waste of public funds. Investigation shows that in Philadelphia it costs approximately 13½ cents for each letter "advanced" by tubes. What is true in Philadelphia is equally true in other cities.

Just follow that, will you?

This is more expensive than special-delivery service.

There is a declaration of the Postmaster General. Where he gets his information I can not tell. He does not get it from the report of his own expert. Now, here is something of an answer to that suggestion.

This is an absurd misstatement of fact as far as the cost per letter "advanced" is concerned, and is an absolute misstatement when it points out that "what is true in Philadelphia is equally true in other cities."

The letters "advanced" or particularly benefited by tubes in Philadelphia during the count of 1913 amounted to 832,435 letters a day, while in the count of 1915 they amounted to but 60,791 letters a day. This clearly indicates an incorrect count, for the total number of letters "advanced" in all tube cities in 1913 amounted to 5,375,147 letters a day, as compared with 4,649,976 in 1915. Nevertheless the Postmaster General says "what is true in Philadelphia is equally true in other cities." But using the figures given for Philadelphia, namely, 60,591 letters per day actually benefited and charging the entire cost of the tube system to these letters, the cost per letter amounts to a little over 7 mills, and not to 13½ cents, as stated by the Postmaster General. Moreover, the average cost of advancing or benefiting letters in all the cities, including Philadelphia, instead of being the same as in Philadelphia, amounts to but approximately one-half mill per letter instead of 13½ cents, or, in other words, 135 mills. The tubes themselves, as already stated, carry approximately 25,000,000 letters a day, and the cost of carrying a single letter is a little more than one-tenth of a mill, or at the rate of, say, 91 letters for 1 cent.

Those are the facts.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator state how long the tubes have been in use?

Mr. BANKHEAD. They have been in use some for 20 years and some for about 25 years.

Mr. FLETCHER. In what condition are they?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The engineers say they are in perfect condition. They can not discover any deterioration in the containers and in the tubes through which they pass; there is practically none. They dwell upon that very question. If the Senator will just read that report he will find they say they will be in just as good condition 25 years from now as they are to-day, judging from their past use in 25 years.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. KENYON. The point that is troubling me about the tube situation on which I want to ask the Senator is this: I think the Senator will agree that the Postmaster General is very much opposed to purchasing these tubes?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Surely; I agree to that.

Mr. KENYON. According to the letter which he has sent to all Senators, he takes the position that they are unnecessary and a hindrance to the operations of the Postal Service. He also takes the position, as he expresses it, that it is 56 miles of junk to be taken over by the Government and a waste of public funds. With the Postmaster General feeling that way about the tube question, is it not a waste to vote money to place in his hands a system of that kind, which he will not operate? Can you compel him in any way by the bill to use these tubes if he feels that it is a waste of public funds to use them?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know whether we can compel the Postmaster General to obey the law or not. That is another question.

Mr. KENYON. He could technically obey the law by making some use of these tubes, but I do not know just how we would compel him—after taking the position he does, that they are a detriment to the Postal Service—to make the full use of them, which should be made if this large amount of money is expended.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama allow me?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The argument of the Senator from Iowa appears to assume that the Postmaster General violates the law, and therefore we must not make the law. Of course, I do not understand that manner of legislating; but if the Senator will permit me for just a moment on the question of use—merely the practical question. I am not going to argue the merits at all.

The city of Boston, an old city as cities go in this country—some 300 years old—in the business part has narrow, crooked streets, and there is where the traffic is heaviest. Putting in pneumatic tubes has been an enormous saving and quickening of the mails not only for Boston but for the whole of northern New England through which the mails come. That is a practical matter of fact.

As I understand it, in my old-fashioned way, I have an idea that the post office existed for the benefit of the people; that the people do not exist for the benefit of the post office, and they do not exist for the amusement of the Postmaster General.

It is of enormous importance to us to have that quick service into Boston and into all New England, and to have the quick service out of Boston which is given us by the pneumatic tubes. There is no possible question, as a matter of fact, but that it would delay every mail passing through New England to the north and every mail that goes from Northern and Southern States to the post office to force automobiles into those narrow streets, especially in winter. It can not fail to make a great delay.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator if they are not being operated now under some contract with the Government by the owners of the tubes?

Mr. LODGE They always have been.

Mr. KENYON. Why can they not keep on being operated?

Mr. LODGE. I am not discussing any detail of it. I think the better way would be for the Government to own them. What we want are the tubes.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the junior Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr WEEKS. May I supplement the answer made to the inquiry of the Senator from Iowa by saying that the Postmaster General last year made a similar statement about the use of the tubes, and Congress in its wisdom provided an appropriation for carrying on the service and put in a provision in connection with it that the tubes should be operated, compelling the Postmaster General by direct provision to operate the tubes? That passed the Senate by a vote of 45 to 25.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BECKHAM. Something has been said about the Boston tubes. I have here a statement made by the postmaster of Boston, which I will read, with the Senator's permission.

> With the automobile reaching the state of efficiency that it has, and the tendency of mailers to send large parcels of mail matter at the first-class rate and by special delivery, the pneumatic-tube service has become an extravagance; and it is my belief that the motor-vehicle service provides a more satisfactory system for the transportation of mail than the pneumatic tubes.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, the postmaster at Boston has expressed an opinion both ways on that subject, and he is expressing the opinion of the department, which is the safest thing to do.

Mr. BECKHAM. I do not think it is fair to assume that the postmasters in the various cities are being influenced by the dictation of the Post Office Department in this matter. I think that is an unjust criticism. It is a fact, Mr. President, that the postmasters in each one of these cities where the pneumatic tube is in use has expressed a similar opinion to the one expressed by the postmaster at Boston.

Mr. LODGE. The postmasters at Boston and the other cities desire to hold their positions. It is perfectly natural.

Mr. BECKHAM. Does the Senator think that their advocacy of the withdrawal of the tube system is necessary in order that they may hold their positions?

Mr. LODGE. I think it is very necessary.

Mr. BECKHAM. I do not agree with the Senator, and I do not think the facts justify it.

I should like to ask the Senator what reason he has for his statement. It is not the Postmaster General alone; it is every expert in that department, with the possible exception of one who takes this position. They have no interest in it that I can see except the good of the service. Why should the department undertake to coerce or to compel such an expression of opinion from the postmaster in Boston or Philadelphia or any other city where the tube service prevails?

Mr. LODGE. Well, Mr. President, that is a common thing. The postmaster at Boston is a very intelligent man, and he has expressed different opinions on this subject at different times, if I remember rightly. I do not doubt his intelligence in holding that opinion; but whether that is his real opinion or whether it is not, I do not impugn his present sincerity at all.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. One moment. The fact is not as he states it. There is not any manner of question about the delay of the mail in Boston if you take away those tubes.

Mr. BECKHAM. That is a difference of opinion, of course.

Mr. LODGE. That is the opinion of everybody who uses the mails.

Mr. BECKHAM. It is not. I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. LODGE. But these officials of the department do not use the mails in Boston. The Boston Chamber of Commerce and all the business men of Boston, without exception, want the pneumatic-tube service. They are the people who use the mails. These Post Office officials do not use the mails.

Mr. BECKHAM. But they are very familiar with the conduct of the mails, and I think they are better informed as to the question of expense, and particularly of efficiency in the handling of mails, than are the business men.

Mr. LODGE. There is the fallacy that lies at the bottom of it all—that the mails are run for the amusement and pleasure of the Postmaster General, and not for the benefit of the people who use them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether it is necessary for the Government to purchase these tubes in order to use them?

Mr. LODGE. That is a question I have not gone into; but in previous years I have supported the contract.

Mr. THOMAS. I understand that to be the question here.

Mr. LODGE. And I think it is a wise and economical thing for the Government to do.

Mr. THOMAS. That may be true prima facie; but does it not appear that the owners of the tubes are losing money and want the Government to take the tubes off their hands?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question.

Mr. NORRIS. Perhaps the Senator from Alabama can answer the question. I was interested in the postmaster's statement, and I concede the postmaster is a very competent witness, and that his evidence ought to be considered, but I desire to inquire who he is?

Mr. BECKHAM. Does the Senator from Nebraska desire the name of the postmaster?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. Has the Senator the name before him?

Mr. LODGE. The name of the postmaster at Boston is William F. Murray.

Mr. NORRIS. Is he the same Mr. Murray who once served in the House of Representatives?

Mr. LODGE. He is.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, Mr. President, I should like to state that while it has been quite a while ago, I served in the House of Representatives with Mr. Murray, and we always had exciting debates in that body with reference to these tubes. As I remember, Mr. Murray, when he was in the House of Representatives, gave very able and voluminous testimony as to the value of the tubes and always advocated them. I may be mistaken, as I am speaking only from memory.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator is not mistaken, and the RECORD shows it.

Mr. NORRIS. I think, in connection with his testimony as postmaster, we ought to take into consideration the fact—at least it ought to go with it—that when he represented his district in Congress he was on the other side of the proposition.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. I was merely going to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that in the one case Mr. Murray was representing the people of Boston, and in the present case he is representing the Post Office Department.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The observation of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] prompts me to ask the Senator from Alabama what sort of test was made in the city of Boston of the carriage of mail by trucks? The Senator from Kentucky advances the argument that the Post Office Department ought to know about the comparative facilities of carrying mail and the comparative efficiency and expense; and I was wondering whether the Senator from Alabama or the Senator from Massachusetts could tell the Senate what sort of test was made by the Post Office Department in carrying mails by truck in the city of Boston, upon which test their recommendation is made for the abandonment of the tubes?

Mr. BANKHEAD. My information, Mr. President, is that that test was made on a Sunday.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And was it not at 5 o'clock in the morning?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am not sure about how early in the day it was; but it was made on a Sunday, as I understand, and of course the natural conclusion is that it was made because they thought it the most favorable time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In other words, the Post Office Department has so much at heart the efficiency of the post-office system, let me say to the Senator from Kentucky, that they made the test on a Sunday, when the streets of Boston were nearly empty of traffic.

Mr. LODGE. That is true.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And upon that test they come to the Senate and say the trucks can do better than the tubes. That is of record. Somewhat the same thing was done in the city of New York. It is not a true test; it is a fraudulent test.

Mr. BECKHAM. Does the Senator say that the test which was made in these other cities was the same as that which was made in Boston?

Mr. WADSWORTH. A similar test to that which was made in Boston, which was of no value, was made in the city of New York. Upon that kind of test Congress is asked to abandon this system which the people of those cities are overwhelmingly in favor of retaining.

Mr. BECKHAM. What does the Senator mean by a "test"? In what way was the test made?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I refer to the time consumed in carrying the mails by trucks through the streets as compared with the time consumed in sending them through the tubes.

Mr. BECKHAM. As I understand, these tests were made not alone upon special occasions, but from general experience. The Senator understands, of course, that these tubes carry only a small percentage even of the letter mail——

Mr. WADSWORTH. They carry a certain class of mail.

Mr. BECKHAM. Of first-class mail less than one-half is carried in the tubes. I think it is about 40 per cent of the letter mail; but the tubes carry only about 4 or 5 per cent of the entire bulk of mail in those cities.

There are automobiles all the time carrying the other mail which is not carried in the tubes. That itself is a test. The Post Office Department in the various cities has made the comparison not alone on the several tests to which the Senator refers, but on the general run of the business when the automobiles were carrying mail at the same time that the tubes were operating; and the Post Office Department experts say that they succeed as well in speed with the mail that they send in wagons as they do with the mail that they send in the tubes.

The advantage of the tubes existed before the development of the automobile. When we were dependent upon horse-drawn vehicles the advantage then of the tubes was apparent; but now the use of the automobile truck in carrying the mails has superseded the advantage or the necessity of the tubes. The Post Office Department, time and time again, through its representatives—not the present Postmaster General alone—have said that they can carry mail just as speedily and at about one-third the cost in automobiles as they can do it in the tubes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator from Kentucky say what other Postmaster General has recommended the abandonment of the tubes?

Mr. BECKHAM. I do not know, but I said "other Postmasters General." I think Postmaster General Hitchcock did at one time, though I am not sure about that; but other representatives of the department have done so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not prior to the incumbency of the present Postmaster General.

Mr. BECKHAM. Several commissions in the last 10 years have recommended it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator state what commissions have done so?

Mr. BECKHAM. I can find their names, and if the Senator desires I shall do so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not want to take the Senator's time.

Mr. BECKHAM. It is not my time; but I do not wish to take the time of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the Senator from Kentucky would spend a long time finding the names of commissions which prior to the incumbency of the present Postmaster General have recommended the abandonment of the tubes.

Mr. BECKHAM. I will yield to the Senator from Alabama for the present, and I will find their names.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, Mr. Edward M. Morgan, former postmaster of the city of New York and an employee of the Post Office Department for about 30 or 40 years, made this statement—I am not going to read it all—

About 80 per cent of all first-class mail matter mailed in the city of New York passes through the tubes.

After his long experience as postmaster and employee of the Post Office Department, he makes that statement. The engineers who were employed to investigate this whole question, and who went into it very diligently, state that "about 72 per cent of the total first-class mail matter in New York passes through the tubes."

Now, where the Senator from Kentucky gets his information that only about 45 per cent of first-class mail goes through the tubes, I do not know; I have seen no such statement. He may have information to that effect, and doubtless he has, but I am giving the evidence of men who were in the employ of the department and of one man who was actually postmaster of that great city for eight years.

Mr. President, I do not care to continue this discussion. So far as economy is concerned, it may be that if automobile service could be continuously used, if there were no interferences with that service because of snowstorms, ice, and congestion in the streets, and it could be rendered regularly there might be greater economy in the use of automobiles. The engineers of Stone & Webster, who went very thoroughly into this question, stated that if there could be continuous service and no interference with it, it is their belief that $115,000 a year might be saved; or, in other words, the service could be operated by automobiles for $115,000 less than the tubes cost, but the same service would not be furnished; that is the point.

The people of this country want the best mail service they can get; they want the mails dispatched promptly. Eighty or 90 per cent of the entire commerce of this country first and last is transacted through the mails. Every business man and every community interested in the Postal Service desire the most rapid transmission of the mails that can be obtained, for the delay of an hour or two or three hours sometimes is very disastrous to business and to communities. That is all there is to this question.

I have no more interest in the tubes than has any other citizen of the country, but I am one of those who believe that the Post Office Department was established for the public and for the uses of the public; I am one of those who do not believe that it was ever intended from the beginning that the Post Office Department should be made a money machine; that all the efforts of the department should be directed to accumulating a surplus to the impairment of the mail service of the country; and that is what has happened; there is no doubt amout that.

This is all I care to say at this time. I may have occasion to say something else later on.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question or two.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will be glad to answer the Senator's questions if I can.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator state how much of rental is paid by the Government now for the use of the pneumatic tubes in the cities where the service is rendered?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Government pays $17,000 a mile.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And how much does it amount to in the total?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It amounts to $976,000.

Mr. SHAFROTH. A year?

Mr. BANKHEAD. A year.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And what kind of a lease has the Government on these tubes?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It has none; the contract has expired. The Government had a contract for 10 years at the price I have named.

Mr. SHAFROTH. When did the 10-year contract expire?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Two years ago; and Congress has been continuing it in each appropriation bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is there any danger of a greater amount being required to be paid by the Government if it does not buy the tubes at the present time?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, I hardly think so; but, if the Senator will permit me this proposal involves a great economy to the Government. Under our proposition it is proposed to buy the tubes and pay for them in 10 years from the amount of rental that we have been paying; so that the Government will own the tubes which it uses at the end of 10 years, and will have bought them for the same amount that we have been paying for rent for the last 10 years.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator know from the practical operation of the tubes whether they get out of repair or whether they are kept in perfect order?

Mr. BANKHEAD. There are little minor disturbances, perhaps, but the engineers say that there is no serious impairment. The engineers testified in regard to that. The little metal containers lined on the outside with rubber, so as to make a tight joint, are slipped into the tube. Compressed air is then applied, and they are sent to their destination. They make a trip in from 8 to 10 seconds through the tube and carry from 8 to 10 pounds of letter mail.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does each container carry that much?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; each container.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator state what kind of franchise the owners of these pneumatic tubes have in the streets?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The pneumatic tube companies have franchises, Mr. President, but we have taken care of that in the provision reported.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If we buy the companies' franchises and the tubes themselves what kind of a franchise will we get and for how long a period?

Mr. BANKHEAD. We do not attach any value at all to the franchises. The Government of the United States does not have a franchise to operate the mail service.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; but if it occupies streets will it not have to secure franchises?

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is a provision in the bill to the effect that the Postmaster General is authorized to negotiate with the city authorities for the right to lay tubes in the streets.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But he has no such permission now as to the present pneumatic tubes?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no; he has not, because there has been no occasion for him to have.

Mr. SHAFROTH. When do the franchises of these companies expire?

Mr. BANKHEAD. At different periods.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Do any of them expire in the near future?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think the Senator from Colorado has Chicago in his mind.

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; I have not. I am merely asking for information.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The franchise of the Chicago Tube Co. expires in 1922 or 1923. The city of Chicago has passed an ordinance requesting the retention of pneumatic-tube service to take care of that situation.

Mr. SHAFROTH. To what effect?

Mr. BANKHEAD. An ordinance is pending to the effect that if the company turns over its tubes to the Government the tube company of the city of Chicago will not owe the city of Chicago anything for the franchise or will not be required to extend the franchise in event the Government acquires the system in that city.

Mr. SHAFROTH. These companies have been required to pay for their franchises, have they not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. In some cases they have, and in other cases they have not paid a cent.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is it contemplated that the Government will pay anything for the use of the streets in the various cities where this service is employed?

Mr. BANKHEAD. On the contrary, if the Senator will read the provisions incorporated in the amendment reported by the committee, he will see that it is expressly provided that it shall not do so.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is a condition on which the purchase is made?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is a condition upon which the tubes are to be taken over, and the Interstate Commerce Commission is authorized to put a value on this property. We provide that so much may be paid, but we do not preclude the Interstate Commerce Commission from saying, after they have investigated the matter and made their physical valuation, that a less amount may be paid.

Mr. President, I reserve whatever else I may have to say to a later time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the Senator from New York desire to ask me a question?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well, then, I yield the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, as a part of the few remarks I wish to make on this question, I send to the desk a copy of a joint resolution passed by the New York State Legislature on this very subject, and ask that it be read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN SENATE,
Albany, April 12, 1918.

By Mr. Cromwell:

Whereas this legislature's action more than 25 years ago made possible the underground mail and parcel transportation which the metropolis enjoys and which all other cities of the State may also possess under the franchise granted by this body; and

Whereas the sentiment of New York, like that of the other large cities of the country, where this modern mail-tube system has been tested is emphatically in favor of it, as indicated by the press, and by public expression, by the great business organizations, and by the public generally: Therefore be it

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That this legislature associates itself with the public's progressive enlightened demand for the retention and extension of such service as a necessity of the post office and a relief to the congestion of the already overcrowded thoroughfares of our larger cities; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the Vice President and Speaker of the House for presentation to Congress.

By order of the senate:

ERNEST A. FAY, Clerk.

IN ASSEMBLY,
April 12, 1918.

Concurred in without amendment.

By order of the assembly:

FRED W. HAMMOND, Clerk.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, it may be of some interest to the Senate to know that this resolution which was adopted by the New York Legislature was adopted by a unanimous vote of both houses. There was not one dissenting vote. The introducer of the resolution is a resident of a New York City district, a man who has not only served for a considerable period in the State senate, but who, before his service in that body, was an important officer of the city government of the city of New York.

I have been told, or I have read somewhere, that the Postmaster General said, or intimated, recently that the New York Legislature in passing this resolution did so in ignorance of the facts, or that the members of the legislature were not sufficiently well informed about the service provided by the tubes in New York to warrant their expressing any judgment upon this question. I do not like to characterize such an opinion by the Postmaster General, if he did utter it, in too harsh language; but may I state for the information of the Senate that nearly one-half of the members of the New York State Legislature are residents of the city of New York, in which these tubes are used; nearly all of them have lived there all their lives, and I assume that all of them are constant users of the first-class mailing facilities of the city, 80 per cent of which goes through the tubes; and to intimate to any body of sensible men that they do not know what they like in the city of New York is to intimate something that is exceedingly difficult to believe.

I find that the New York Sun of April 28 contains a very interesting article by a former postmaster of New York, Hon. William R. Willcox, who on former occasions has appeared before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and expressed his view of the pneumatic-tube service. I shall not read all of the article by any means, for it would consume too much time. Suffice it to say that Mr. Willcox, who was postmaster of the city for some time, and in whom the present administration has sufficient confidence to bring him here to Washington to help with the railway administration, most stoutly defends the pneumatic-tube service, and decries any attempt to abandon it. If the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] were still in the Chamber, he would be interested in some of the things that Mr. Willcox says. He says:

The first attack on the tubes was made in 1916 in a report by a commission of five so-called postal experts, who were merely post-office inspectors. Now, inspectors are valuable postal employees, but certainly not experts in any line but their own, which is a sort of detective work, watching for inefficiency and malfeasance among employees. Yet the opponents of tube service would persuade Congress to prefer their opinions to those of hundreds of business men, city officials, responsible editors, and even some of the most eminent Members of both Houses of Congress itself.

Then he goes on to say that the Merchants' Association of New York conducted a very thorough inquiry of its own into the whole question of the pneumatic-tube service:

The Merchants' Association analyzed the tests by which it had been sought to prove that motor vehicles were vastly more efficient than the tubes. They showed that test runs had been made in total disregard of service conditions. In Boston, for instance, 5 a. m. of a midsummer Sunday was the time chosen for a test run—chosen because it presented the absolute minimum of street traffic. But the truly fraudulent character of the tests is shown by comparing the time made in these runs with the time allowed for actual service runs under the department's own schedule. Thus in Boston a run was made in 3 minutes 40 seconds over a route where the department's schedule allows 10 minutes, and in Chicago a test run of 17 minutes was over a route which in actual service requires 52 minutes.

The rest of this remarkable report is of a similar character, and the case against the tubes rests primarily upon this report. A congressional commission has just reported the result of a careful investigation of the tube service.

Then Mr. Willcox proceeds to cite some of the findings of the congressional commission.

I think that statement, which is corroborated by the statements of other gentlemen, will do something to open the eyes of Members of the Senate who entertain doubt on this question as to the character of the tests that were made by the so-called experts of the department in attempting to prove that the tubes are out of date, and that trucks, operating upon the heavily congested streets of our cities, constitute a superior facility for transporting first-class mail. I do not like to impugn the motives of any executive department; but in all frankness I would suggest to the Senate, and in particular to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]—for we had a little colloquy about it a moment ago—that it is exceedingly difficult to explain why the Post Office Department, in attempting to prove its case, should conduct a test at 5 o'clock in the morning of a midsummer Sunday in the city of Boston. The only explanation that comes to the mind of an observant person of reasonable intelligence is that they were so desperately anxious to prove that automobile trucks could carry mail faster than the tubes that they deliberately chose a time when there was no congestion of the streets. There can be no other explanation for it. It could not have been done casually or accidentally; and the same thing was done in the city of New York, although not in quite the same way. But the tests upon which the recommendations of the Post Office Department were made a year ago—if I am wrong in my dates, the Senator from Alabama can correct me—were made in midsummer, in the month of August, when everyone living in the city of New York and every postal expert who has ever been to the city or who has served in the city knows that the congestion in the streets is infinitely less than it is through the winter months. And yet it is upon that kind of tests that the Senate is asked to abandon the tube service—for that is the question that is really before the Senate—and to substitute for the tube service automobile trucks.

Now, Mr. Morgan has been quoted.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. BECKHAM. A few minutes ago the Senator asked me what commissions had ever reported against these tubes or what Postmasters General had ever taken a position against them. If he will permit me, I will call his attention to two instances where this matter came up in the reports of commissions.

The first was a commission appointed in compliance with the provisions of the act of May 27, 1908. It was composed of Daniel A. Campbell, postmaster, Chicago, Ill.; George H. Roberts, postmaster, Brooklyn, N. Y.; E. C. Mansfield, postmaster, Boston, Mass.; Frank Wyman, postmaster, St. Louis, Mo.; Joseph Stewart, Second Assistant Postmaster General; V. J. Bradley, superintendent Railway Mail Service; E. M. Norris, assistant superintendent Division of Salaries Allowances; J. M. Masten, assistant superintendent Railway Mail Service.

The unanimous conclusion and recommendation of this commission as to the advisability of purchasing the tubes were as follows—and the Senate will bear in mind that this was at a time before the automobile service had been developed:

The present contracts under which the tube companies are performing mail service will not expire until June 30, 1916—almost eight years hence. During that period there should be ample opportunity for the companies to perfect the systems and for the Post Office Department to observe the effect upon the Postal Service. Further, during that period it is possible that other methods of transportation will be developed or improved so as to change entirely the outlook as it now appears. Five or six years hence, we believe, it will be advisable to renew the consideration of the question of Government ownership.

In view of the foregoing, we consider it appropriate to advise you that, in our opinion, it is not feasible and desirable at the present time for the Government to purchase, to install, or to operate the pneumatic tubes, and this is our unanimous judgment.

In transmitting this report to Congress on December 15, 1908, the Postmaster General, George von L. Meyer, approved the conclusions of the commission. So there was his approval, 10 years ago.

I do not like to trespass on the Senator's time——

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is very interesting, and I am glad the Senator read it.

Mr. BECKHAM. There is one other instance, which I will read:

A departmental committee was appointed by the Postmaster General July 27, 1910, to inquire into and investigate the pneumatic-tube service at Chicago, Ill., in regard to the feasibility and desirability of extending this service. This committee was composed of postal experts. Its report discloses that at that time serious consideration was being given to the use of the motor truck in the transmission of mails. In dealing with this subject it states:

"Your committee feels that the improvement in this class of vehicle in the past few years offers possibilities in the transportation of mails in cities worthy of the most careful consideration on the part of the department, and which were not available for the consideration of committees reporting upon the feasibility of pneumatic-tube service in cities in years past. The rapidity with which this class of service has developed is illustrated by the statement that the motor wagon as a commercial utility in Chicago has been in general use for only about three years.

"This committee understands that the department has requested authority from Congress to arrange for the construction of a 30-inch pneumatic tube in the city of Cincinnati, and will likely receive the same. If a tube of that diameter should prove practicable for the transportation of all classes of mail matter without breaking bulk, it would doubtless replace, when the present contract term expires, a portion of the present 8-inch tubes. This would also apply in the construction of new tubes between points where the volume of mail is sufficient to warrant the construction and operation of the larger tube, and where such construction is practicable.

"Your committee therefore, in view of all the circumstances enumerated, unanimously reaches the conclusion that it is not advisable to extend the existing pneumatic-tube service in Chicago, Ill., at the present time."

The judgment of this committee that the service be not extended had the approval of Hon. Joseph Stewart, then Second Assistant Postmaster General, and of Hon. F. H. Hitchcock, then Postmaster General.

While that report does not condemn the entire system, the commissioners who made the report, and the Postmaster General, who indorsed it, believed that there was certainly no benefit in the extension of this tube service anywhere; and that, I take it, is an argument against it. If the tube service is a good thing for these five cities, why should it not be a good thing for other large cities in this country? There is never any proposal now to extend it or to develop it in any other city. There is not any serious proposal to extend it now in any of the cities where it exists, because it is recognized that it is obsolete, and that in the light of the development of the use of the automobile there is really no use for these tubes.

I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him at such length.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As to one of the cities, at least, the Senator is inaccurate. There has been a persistent and most earnest request for the extension of the tubes in the city of New York. It has been recommended by all the local authorities. The whole borough of the Bronx, lying north of the Harlem River, containing something like 800,000 people—a city by itself as large as the city of Detroit—is exceedingly anxious for the pneumatic tubes to be extended under the Harlem River to give service to the Bronx central station. The Borough of Kings, the city of Brooklyn, has been anxious for some years for the extension of the tubes into Brooklyn. I think my colleague will bear me out in that statement.

Mr. CALDER. We have a tube into Brooklyn, but not into the outlying sections.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But there has been a persistent request for the extension of the tubes in the city of New York, and all the local authorities, including the city administration, on more than one occasion have made requests in that direction. The Senator is mistaken when he says that there is no request for an extension of this service. As a matter of fact, the extension would be of tremendous benefit to certain parts of the great city of New York.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to remind the Senator from New York that when the contract was made for 10 years in 1906 it included the cities of San Francisco, Kansas City, Pittsburgh, Cleveland, and, I think, Detroit. There were five cities included, and no one has been able to raise the money to install the service in those cities. Quite likely capital looked ahead and saw the possibility of a Postmaster General who would be willing to destroy private property in this way, and failed to go into that service; but, in any case, it never has been possible to raise the money to install tube service in those cities.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, does not the Senator think that if the Government should undertake the purchase of these tubes, as proposed in this bill, and adopt the Government ownership proposition, it would be committed to a large extent to developing the tube system in these other cities?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I hope the Government would be committed to it. I hope the Government would be committed to the extension of these tubes into The Bronx, for example.

Mr. BECKHAM. I am not referring so much to their extension in cities where they now exist, but to building them in other large cities where they do not now exist.

Mr. WEEKS. If the mail facilities required it, I hope the Government would be committed to it, and I believe they would in the cities that I have mentioned.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I should like to continue my remarks for just a moment. If the Government does go into this as a policy and extends the service into other cities, you will never find those other cities coming to Congress and asking its abandonment. As I understand, the representatives from every city which now possesses the tubes are in favor of their retention; and certainly they must in some degree reflect the wishes of their constituents. If it were left to the people of the city of New York to say whether or not the tubes should be abandoned the result would be an overwhelming victory for the tubes in a popular vote, and I imagine the same thing is true of Boston and Philadelphia and St. Louis and Chicago. If the Government should put them in other cities, such as Detroit and San Francisco and Kansas City, the Senator from Kentucky would never have anything to worry about as to what those people thought of the service after they had once enjoyed its facilities.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from New York why the owners of these tubes want to sell them when they are bringing in a revenue, as I understand, of $900,000 a year on a capital of $4,500,000? They are getting nearly 20 per cent upon their investment. Why do they want to sell to the Government when they are getting such a large return?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts, who is a member of the commission. I can not answer that question as accurately as he can.

Mr. WEEKS. That is a pertinent query, I think, and should be answered. The truth is that these tubes have cost in the neighborhood of $7,000,000. If the Senator from Alabama will pardon me, I think he stated that the cost was the maximum figure placed by the commission for their purchase, namely, $4,427,000. That was not the cost of the tubes. That is the estimate of their replacement cost in normal times. But the Senator must remember that there has been a vast amount of expenditure connected with the location of these tubes which would not go into a replacement cost, and the books of the company show that there have been something like $7,000,000 spent in the construction of the tubes. Now the companies have to run these tubes, and they do it without any expense to the Government, but the operation costs between five and six hundred thousand dollars a year. They have to pay taxes, and they have to do other things which the Government will not have to do. Therefore, as a facility for the use of the Government, and for no other purpose, it is believed that the Government should control them. The Senator can easily see that the net return is not 20 per cent, but it is not even 10 per cent of the maximum price that the commission has put on the purchase of the tubes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It would be considerably over 5 per cent.

Mr. WEEKS. It would be over 5 per cent, but no sane man puts any money into an enterprise of that kind on a 5 per cent basis.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then, if that is the case, why is it not cheaper for the Government to still continue to pay this rental instead of having money invested in it?

Mr. WEEKS. That is a pertinent inquiry, and I should like to answer it, if the Senator from New York will pardon me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I shall be very glad to have the Senator answer it.

Mr. WEEKS. The appropriation which the commission recommends is exactly the appropriation which we have been making for the rental of the tubes. It is the appropriation we have made for 10 years. The amortization which will take place, including the Government's operating the tubes, is less than the company has been able to do it for, because it does not have to pay taxes and other expenses, and there will be at the end of 10 years this condition: The Government will own the tubes and will not appropriate any more money in 5 or 10 years than in the preceding 10 years has been appropriated for renting the tubes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Outside of the question of taxes, would the Government expenses be any less than those of the private owners in operating the tubes?

Mr. WEEKS. It certainly would in very many ways. There are overhead operating expenses, attorneys' fees, and many other expenses, which the Senator can learn by examining the report of the tube company, which the company has to pay out, but which the Government would not have to pay.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I am making these inquiries for information. I should like to have the Senator answer one more question. I was utterly astounded to find that this tube was only an 8-inch tube. It struck me when I first heard that that it would be out of the question to build now an 8-inch tube; that its capacity would not be sufficient to carry many letters. Is there anything in the idea that these tubes may have outgrown their usefulness; that therefore the companies are trying to get rid of them, and that really a tube of three or four times its size should be placed in, and the Government would immediately be required to enlarge the tubes? Is there anything in that proposition?

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator from New York will allow me, there is not, in my opinion. The only tube larger than 8 inches is the short service in Boston of 3 or 4 miles, which is a 10-inch tube. The experts have agreed that the 8-inch tube for first-class mail is the most economical and in every way the only size of tube which is adaptable for that service. It is not intended that these tubes shall carry any other than first-class mail. That is the kind of mail which we wish to expedite.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does the Senator know whether there are any tubes in existence of, say, 1 or 2 feet in diameter?

Mr. WEEKS. There is a tube in London under construction for the purpose of carrying all kinds of mail which is larger.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And it works successfully?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not think it has been working long enough to demonstrate it. I will say to the Senator from Colorado that there is one other tube in this country 2 miles in length, running from the customhouse in New York. I think it runs from the old post office. It was purchased by the Government some two years ago by the Treasury Department. The department, after reports of engineers were obtained, is paying $85,000 a mile, and that is materially more than the estimated price which the commission placed on the mileage of tubes it is now proposed to take over.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] if he can refer us to any report ever made by a commission authorized by the Postmaster General before this administration which recommended a discontinuance of the tube service?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BECKHAM. I have already read two instances.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That did not recommend a discontinuance of the service; it suggested that it was unwise. It never said anything about a discontinuance of it.

Mr. BECKHAM. I merely read what the reports said in their conclusions.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Kentucky did not read all the report, and the part which was omitted is rather significant.

Mr. BECKHAM. I will say to the Senator that what I read was in the report of the minority of the committee. I was reading from the minority report of the commission presented by Congressman ROUSE, and I read what he used in that report.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The minority report?

Mr. BECKHAM. The minority report of the commission. He gave extracts from the report to which I referred.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The pneumatic-tube commission, headed by Mr. Daniel A. Campbell, reported in part as follows. I shall not read it all, but the part inserted in the RECORD by the Senator from Kentucky was the ninth paragraph, as I remember it.

Mr. BECKHAM. What is the date of that report?

Mr. WADSWORTH. December 10, 1908. The first paragraph of that report reads:

> The pneumatic-tube service is a very important auxiliary for the rapid transportation of first-class mail in the most important cities.

Which is exactly what we have been contending for.

Mr. BECKHAM. That was true in 1908, and it was true for some years later, because there were no automobiles at that time. All mail in the city that was not delivered in pneumatic tubes had to be delivered by horse-drawn vehicles, and there is no question but that the tubes offered quicker service at that time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will continue:

> 1. The pneumatic-tube service is a very important auxiliary for the rapid transportation of first-class mail in the most important cities, and performs a function not at present obtainable by other means.
> 2. Its constant availability makes it particularly appropriate for special-delivery mail, for all first-class mail of local origin for local delivery, for supplementary closings of first-class mail for dispatch by train, and for advance dispatches of first-class mail from trains for city delivery.

That state of facts still holds true. It is constantly available, and no motor truck on earth is constantly available.

I can not concede the correctness of the argument of the Senator from Kentucky, for he knows as well as I do that when there is a foot of snow on the streets of Boston or New York motor trucks are tied up; but the tubes are not.

Mr. BECKHAM. This report states that in Chicago during the past winter, which was the severest winter known for a great many years in that city or elsewhere, where the conditions as to weather are as bad, probably, as in any other large city in the country, there was no delay any day of the mails by a failure of the automobiles to deliver them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There was no delay in the delivery of first-class mails because they went through the tubes.

Mr. BECKHAM. No; not all the first-class mail matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. A large percentage of them did. I must insist on continuing my remarks.

The experience in the city of New York is that there are hundreds of instances of motor trucks missing train connections. In four months, from December, 1915, to March, 1916, 209 trains were missed by motor trucks. The tubes never miss trains. The cartons pass under the streets and it makes no difference how much snow there is, or sleet or ice—no matter how complicated is the congestion or the traffic situation—nothing interferes with the pneumatic tubes.

The cartons proceed at the rate of 30 miles an hour through those tubes and are despatched 10 or 15 times a minute, if my recollection is correct.

I am not going to base my remarks on specific cases of failure or success, but let me suggest this to Senators who have paid some attention at least to the traffic situation in cities. Every progressive city in this country is trying to relieve its streets of traffic. It is trying to get everything underground that can be put underground and used there. Here in the city of Washington, as a result of a statute of Congress, trolley wires are not allowed to be strung through the streets, and that accounts for the slots through which the trolleys are operated on the streets of this city. The same is true in the city of New York. I know that years ago they forbade stringing through the streets of the city telephone, telegraph, or trolley wires. The telephone and telegraph wires in the city of New York are buried in tubes—anything to get them off the streets, to get them out of the way, to get them out of the air. The trolley wires are buried under the slots in the middle of the streets—anything to get the wires and the poles off the street, off the sidewalk and out of the air, to clear the atmosphere, to clear the congestion. The city of New York spent $400,000,000 in building subways to get traffic off the streets—a desperate effort. It has not succeeded even yet in building enough subways, and they have spent more money than the Federal Government spent in building the Panama Canal in a desperate effort to get traffic off the streets. The whole tendency toward the solution of this problem in heavily congested cities is to get things underground, and here comes the Post Office Department and says that we must take these tubes up and put trucks on the streets. It is a step backward. Every student of municipal affairs knows it. Every city official who came before the committee has protested against it. I dare not trust my memory as to the deaths caused on the streets of New York by traffic. Perhaps my colleague [Mr. CALDER] can give that information. The deaths and injuries amount to some dozens a day. Yet here is a proposal to put more United States mail trucks upon the streets of the city of New York and hamper its efforts to relieve the congestion of the traffic.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to ask whether the Government now has put any of its own trucks in in place of these tubes?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not heard that they have purchased or contracted for the trucks. I have heard that they have trucks in view.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Can they get the trucks without taking them away from the necessary supply of the Army at this time?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I assume it would be very difficult, knowing what I do about the difficulty of the Army getting trucks.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Senator is on the Military Committee and is familiar with the subject, and the question addressed itself to me at this time as to whether it was wise to divert this traffic from the means of conveyance already provided for and force it on trucks when we know the difficulty of the Army in getting trucks for present emergencies is very great.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is entirely true. Every truck counts just as every airplane counts, and the Army should be served first. I do not know what the plan of the Post Office Department is in that direction, but I do know that the men who have for years studied this question of traffic congestion are most disturbed and discouraged at the suggestion coming from officers of the Federal Government that a backward step of this kind shall be taken.

Let me close by saying that the public sentiment in the cities that now have the tubes is overwhelmingly in favor of their retention, that the city administrations are bitterly opposed, as a rule, to putting any more traffic upon the streets. I remember very well the appearance made by the city administration officials of the city of New York here last year. The chief of the traffic squad of the New York police department was here and told the committee what it meant, that every additional truck meant so much more danger to women and little children upon the streets of that city; that their problem of traffic control is almost impossible, as it is.

Even to-day, Mr. President, they are wondering what they are going to do with the ever-increasing traffic, and suggestions are being made for the expenditure of literally millions and millions of dollars by the city to erect elevated ways in order to get some of the traffic off the main streets and more subways, not only for passenger traffic but for vehicle traffic. If the Senate will listen, as I hope it will, to the representatives in this body who represent the cities now using the tubes it will vote overwhelmingly in favor of their retention. There has not been a criticism from the patrons of the post offices in those cities where the tubes are used, and after all it is the patrons of the post office who should be served.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, I shall take only a few minutes on this subject, as I have already interrupted Senators in the discussion of it and expressed some views upon it.

In the first place I want to express regret that I find myself in disagreement with the distinguished chairman of the committee and other members of that committee. I have the very highest regard for their intelligence, sincerity, and earnestness in this matter, but I do not agree with them in the conclusions which they have reached in their report to the Senate.

Here we have a system that has been in existence in these five cities for about 25 years. The Post Office Department and everyone connected with that department, with the exception possibly of one, tell us that the tube system in the light of present-day conditions is absolutely useless; that it is of no more value to the service than so much junk; and that the department would not want it as a gift.

I shall not undertake to present to the Senate all the numerous statements and arguments made against the use of the tubes. I have been convinced, however, from what I have heard and read about it that the department is right.

There is no reason, Mr. President, to reflect upon the motives of the Postmaster General or of any official in that department upon this question. Can anyone conceive of any reason why the Postmaster General or those associated with him should have cause to oppose the use of these tubes unless it be because they believe that the service does not need them?

I know it is true that large numbers of business men, of commercial and civic organizations, in the cities where the tubes are located, have interested themselves in the matter, and have come before the committee and have written letters and used what influence they could upon Congress for the retention of the tubes. I do not mean to criticize any of the gentlemen who have done that; I think they have been sincere, but I think they have been misled by the owners of the tubes. In some instances it has been shown that some of those who advocated so vigorously the retention of the tube system did not know where the stations were located in the cities where they live. They have been led to believe by the owners of these systems, who are in some instances, I imagine, influential business men in those cities, that it was a valuable system and a valuable adjunct to the mail service in those cities.

As I stated before, Mr. President, there is no doubt but that some years ago, and for some years following the installation of these systems, they were of great service, because in those years all the mail transportation in the cities was carried in vehicles drawn by horses, and the speed, of course, by the pneumatic tube was far greater than could be secured in that way. But in recent years the automobile has been so developed that now the post-office officials in practically all instances can deliver the mail between stations in these cities as rapidly with the automobiles on the surface as they can with the pneumatic tubes under the ground.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BECKHAM. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I am curious to know why it is necessary for the Government to buy these tubes in order to continue the service which they have been rendering for some years. If I understand the amendment now before the Senate, it involves the matter of purchase, and that alone. Why should the Government buy the systems in these cities which have been heretofore operated and which are said to be so indispensable to the proper transmission of the mails? Having been operated heretofore by private parties, by the owners and under contracts with the Government, it occurs to me that there must be some reason why these concerns want at this time to sell their property to the Government. If the tubes and the systems are so indispensable, I can very easily perceive why they should be continued; but why should the Government at this time, when it is needing all the money that can possibly be raised by taxation and by bond sales, take four or five million dollars and invest it in these tubes? That is the question which has puzzled me.

Mr. BECKHAM. It will amount to a great deal more than four or five million dollars in the end.

Mr. THOMAS. As I read the amendment, of course I reached that sum. I know nothing about the facts, and the committee which has investigated the matter is, of course, more competent to treat the subject in its principles than I am.

Mr. BECKHAM. If the owners of the tubes should get what they ask, it would be a very valuable transaction to them. I can not blame them for seeking to get the best price they can for the tubes, but I was discussing another matter.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Kentucky would like to have me reply now to the inquiry of the Senator from Colorado or would he rather that I should not interrupt him now. I will notify the Senator from Colorado that the committee is fully prepared to answer the question. Probably the Senator from Kentucky would rather that I would wait and speak in my own time.

Mr. BECKHAM. A little later, because I am discussing another feature now.

Mr. HARDWICK. Very well.

Mr. BECKHAM. As I said, Mr. President, I can not conceive of any motive that the Post Office Department could have in a matter of this kind except that of securing the very best and most efficient service possible throughout the country and in the cities where this pneumatic system exists. Senators understand that the capacity of the pneumatic tubes, with the containers now used to carry the letters, is very limited. They carry a very small part of the entire mail in these cities. I understand it is about 4 or 5 per cent of the entire bulk, and they carry only about 40 per cent of the letters.

The Post Office Department, of course, makes other arrangements to carry the mail not served by the tubes, and they are doing it by the screen wagons or automobile trucks, and, from their statements, they are getting in that way quicker and better service than they get through the tubes.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the Senator inadvertently is giving a wrong impression relative to the first-class mail carried in the tubes. The reason why the tubes do not carry a larger percentage of first-class mail is because they do not connect with all the stations in the city. They connect with only a limited number of stations. Practically speaking, they carry all the mail from one station to another where the connection is made.

Mr. BECKHAM. Something has been said here, I think by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], about the tests that have been made, and that certain tests have been made on Sunday or at early hours in the morning, when the streets were not congested with traffic. If you stop to think of the relatively small amount of mail that goes into these containers and through the tubes, you can put it into automobiles that the Post Office Department is already using, with some additional automobiles they may have to get, and you will find that it will make very little difference in the matter of traffic conditions in those cities. It will take comparatively few additional trucks, I understand, to do it.

Mr. HARDWICK. How many automobiles will it take to transport 25,000,000 letters a day?

Mr. BECKHAM. I have not at hand definitely the number of automobiles it will take in each of the cities, but if the Senator will look into the report of the minority he will find it given there.

It is a comparatively small number, and it is not such a number as will add a particle to the traffic difficulties in any of these cities.

Now, speaking about the matter of tests, as I understand the position of the Post Office Department they are not relying upon any specific test, but they are relying upon the general experience in handling the mails in the tube cities. They are having parallel experiences with the tubes and with the automobile service now. They have been having it for years. The automobiles are running between the same stations where the tubes are employed.

I have here some figures, with a statement from the department, that will be of interest. The Senator from New York made a statement about the delays in automobile delivery. Those delays, according to the figures of the department, are not near so frequent or serious as the delays in these tubes.

That the pneumatic tubes are unreliable and fast deteriorating and that they cause damage and delay to important mail is shown by the April, 1918, records of the post offices where tubes are operated.

This is merely for the last month, remember—

In Chicago during the month of April, 1918, 1,924 pouches of letter mail, or approximately 4,000,000 letters, were subjected to delay from 5 minutes to 13 hours and 25 minutes. At this rate, 48,000,000 letters would be delayed yearly in Chicago alone. During this same period Government-owned automobiles, by which 61 per cent of the letter mail and more than 95 per cent of the entire bulk of mail in Chicago is transported, failed to make but 6 connections, involving a delay of 7 pouches, approximately 14,000 letters, or at the rate of 168,000 letters a year.

The following is a comparative statement of the two services in that city for the month of April, 1918:

	Pouches subjected to delay.	Letters subjected to delay.	Proportion of letters carried.	Proportion of entire mail carried.
			Per cent.	Per cent.
Pneumatic tubes	1,924	4,000,000	39	5
Automobiles	6	14,000	61	95

In many instances, because of the stoppage of the tubes, it was necessary to dig up the streets in order that mail lodged in the lines might be recovered. In each instance the interruption in service was brought to the attention of the pneumatic-tube company, but no explanation by the company has been made.

That the pneumatic tubes are fast deteriorating is evidenced by the increasing number of breakdowns and stoppages not chargeable to the human element. During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1917, in the city of Chicago 8,160 pouches, or approximately 17,000,000 letters, were subjected to delay on account of stoppages of the tubes, or at the rate of 680 pouches, 1,416,000 letters, a month, as compared with 1,924 pouches, or 4,000,000 letters, delayed during the month of April, 1918.

The damage caused to letter mail by the pneumatic tubes is best illustrated by the few samples submitted by the postmasters at Chicago and Philadelphia covering the brief period in April of this year shown by the postmarks.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BECKHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Was the Senator reading in that report of something which occurred in Chicago about the stopping of the tubes?

Mr. BECKHAM. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think it is but fair to say that, while that is true, it was entirely due to an explosion in the streets, which for a time put the tubes out of commission, and of course nobody could prevent that.

Mr. BECKHAM. I understand that those accidents are frequently happening in cities other than Chicago, that this tube service is fast deteriorating, and, as the department says, accidents have been growing more frequent than heretofore.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BECKHAM. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. The reports of both the engineers employed by the commission and the Government engineers are to the effect that there has been no deterioration of the tubes, but that they are certainly good for from 25 to 50 years.

Mr. BECKHAM. Will the Senator from Massachusetts tell us who those engineers were?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes. The Government engineer was Chief Engineer A. B. Fry, of the Treasury service, and the engineers representing the commission were engineers connected with Stone & Webster.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BECKHAM. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether the tube service in the city of Boston was not originally constructed for the transportation of freight and parcels?

Mr. WEEKS. There were about 3 miles originally constructed for the transportation of parcels. That was a 10-inch tube.

Mr. THOMAS. Is it a fact that it proved to be a failure?

Mr. WEEKS. It proved to be a failure from a financial standpoint for the reason that there are surrounding the city of Boston, as the Senator will recall, a large number of smaller communities which are really a part of Boston. There is a very complete service between those smaller places and the centers in Boston; but the difficulty was in getting the parcels first from the place where they originated to the tube and then from the end of the tube to the purchaser of the parcel. They had to be transferred twice, and that delay and additional expense rendered the tubes unprofitable.

Mr. THOMAS. My recollection is that when this subject was before the last Congress—the Senator from Massachusetts will correct me if I am in error—it was stated that the tubes were originally built for the transportation of merchandise, and after they had proved to be a failure for that purpose a contract was made with the Government for their use in the transportation of mail.

Mr. WEEKS. They were taken over by the Government and connected with 8-inch tubes that were being constructed. By the way, the 8-inch tube is used in the 10-inch pipe that was formerly used for the transportation of parcels.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, it is not my desire or purpose to take up more time in this matter. I have given it some study and thought, and while, as I have said, I greatly respect the opinion of my colleagues on the committee who take a different view from mine, I feel convinced that it would be a useless and wasteful expenditure of Government money to buy these tubes. The officials of the Post Office Department are charged with the responsibility for the efficient and satisfactory administration of the Postal Service, and they are practically unanimous in the expression of their view that they do not want or need this system. They say they can give better and speedier service without the tube system with the use of the automobiles, and that they can do it at one-third of the cost for the tube service. I see no reason, therefore, why we should not defer to their judgment in this case, give them a trial, and let the tubes be abandoned; it might be for a year or so. It is probable that they would not be taken up in that time, and their use could be resumed if desirable. The Post Office Department would be put upon a test as to whether or not its statements and its promises in regard to this matter can be relied upon. I believe that they can be.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. BECKHAM. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky a question or two for information. It has developed in the discussion that these tubes are only 8 inches in diameter. That was somewhat of a surprise to me, for a very limited quantity of mail can be transmitted in a tube only 8 inches in diameter. Of course, it requires frequent discharges of the containers through the casing.

I want further to know whether this system, which may have been adequate at the time the tubes were first installed, is not now obsolete by reason of the fact that they are too small to carry a sufficient quantity of mail?

I should like also to know whether there is any expectation that as soon as we purchase these tubes there will be a movement to make 2-foot tubes, and that they may, therefore, have to be reconstructed by the Government, probably at enormous cost?

I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky whether or not he has investigated these matters, and whether there is anything in the suggestions which I have made?

Mr. BECKHAM. There may be developed in the future an underground system for transmission of mail, but not a pneumatic-tube system. I think, in the light of present-day conditions and experience, that system is a failure. There are a great many accidents in the tubes, as I am informed. A great deal of mail is destroyed. There are thousands and thousands of letters in the service each year that are ruined by these containers coming open and something happening to the letters getting into the tubes. These [exhibiting] are just a few that were gathered in one day from one of the tubes. The destruction of the mail which is handled by the tubes is much greater than it is in any similar amount of mail which is handled by automobile.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BECKHAM. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to remind the Senator from Kentucky that the records do not show any such destruction of mail. As the Senator from Kentucky is well aware, the mail is put into a receptacle, which is closed, and it is then dispatched through the tube. The only possibility of any harm to the mail comes where the receptacle in some way gets open. There are instances, it is true, where that has happened; but they are so remote and so infrequent that, as a matter of fact, they are negligible. The records of the department itself demonstrate the correctness of that statement.

Mr. BECKHAM. If the Senator from Massachusetts will look at the report of the minority of the commission, he will see the statement that many thousands of letters are destroyed in this way each year; that the containers may be imperfectly closed, and in their transit through the tubes become open; there is congestion, and the letters in many instances are destroyed and in other cases they are injured.

Mr. President, I do not wish to take up more time of the Senate. I think we have reached a point where we may well abandon the use of these tubes and save to the people the useless expenditure of many millions of dollars.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BECKHAM. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Kentucky has observed that in many instances the containers are not properly closed. Whose fault is that? Is it the fault of the post-office officials?

Mr. BECKHAM. I could not answer that question. I do not know whether it is the fault of the employees of the tube company or of the Post Office Department, but I would suppose it would be the fault of the employees of the tube company.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think it is the fault of the employees of the Post Office Department, and that it ought not to be charged up against the system.

Mr. BECKHAM. I am not prepared to say as to that, but my guess would be that the tube company would have its own employees in charge of each end of it.

I think, therefore, Mr. President, the statements which have been made by the Postmaster General and by other post-office officials, that they can give to the country and to the cities concerned much more satisfactory, much more efficient, and much more economical service by the abandonment of the tubes, should be accepted, and that we should give them a chance to do it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, is the question on agreeing to the committee amendment as printed in the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended. There has been an amendment adopted to the committee amendment.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I am opposed to the purchase by the Government of these tubes at the present time. It seems that we have had an investigation of the matter and there is a divided report. The minority report states that the tubes are not effective; that they are not desirable for the service; and that they have not facilitated the delivery of mail in proportion to the amount of the cost.

The minority report also sets forth that the franchises granted for the operation and the laying down of the tubes are about to expire in a great many instances and necessarily can not be renewed without expense to somebody. The Post Office Department is opposed to the further continuance and operation of this system. It says it is archaic, it is ineffectual, it is worn out and useless junk.

I wish here to introduce into the RECORD a copy of a letter of the Postmaster General to the chairman of the committee who made the majority report for the purchase of the tubes—a copy of which letter, I presume, has been received by each Senator—giving something like 14 very substantial reasons why the Government should not be compelled to purchase a system for delivering the mail that is absolutely worthless, in the opinion of the Postmaster General. I ask that this letter be published in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the letter referred to by him.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why can we not have it read?

Mr. KIRBY. I will be glad to have it read, and will ask that the Secretary read it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator think that is necessary, when each one of us has had a copy of that letter from the Postmaster General? I have read it, and so, I apprehend, has every other Senator read it.

Mr. KIRBY. I do not care to have it read if it is not desired. I do, however, want it to go into the RECORD.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I may have received a copy of the letter, but I have not read it; we have some other duties to perform here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas has the floor. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that the letter referred to be inserted in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., April 2}, 1918.

HON. WILLIAM F. KIRBY,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR KIRBY: Attached find copy of a letter addressed to Senator BANKHEAD, chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, outlining the reasons why the department feels that the pneumatic tubes should not be purchased, operated, or rented by the Government, and which I trust you will find time to carefully read.

Very sincerely,

A. S. BURLESON.

APRIL 23, 1918.

HON. J. H. BANKHEAD,
Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BANKHEAD: The bill (H. R. 7237) making appropriation for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, and for other purposes, carries an amendment, beginning with line 14, on page 14, making an appropriation of $976,000 for the transmission of mail by pneumatic tubes and provides for the purchase and operation of the tubes by the Government on and after July 1, 1918. The amendment also prescribes the method of purchase and fixes the maximum amount which can be paid for the properties at $4,432,622.

This amendment is not in the interest of the Postal Service and I wish to vigorously protest against its enactment. My objections are based on the following reasons:

1. The tubes are unnecessary and a hindrance to efficient operation of the Postal Service. The volume of all classes of mail has so greatly increased and surface transportation so greatly improved, both as to speed and frequency, that the tubes are no longer of value. This is illustrated by the fact that in 1913 it was estimated that 5,375,147 letters were advanced daily through the use of the tubes, while in 1915 only 2,837,638, or about one-half, were advanced. No doubt this ratio of reduction has continued; and if so, there is now little or no mail advanced by the tubes, notwithstanding the fact that the screen-wagon schedules are arranged so as to secure the greatest advantage of the tubes.

2. Because of their limited capacity, the tubes can not be used to meet emergent conditions, and for that reason delay millions of letters annually.

3. Because of their unreliability, due to breakdowns and stoppages, the tubes cease operation for hours and even days at a time, and it is often necessary to dig up the streets to obtain the mail clogged in the tubes. When this occurs it is necessary to immediately substitute vehicle service, which results in confusion of schedules, thereby disorganizing the transportation and delivery services and causing delay to large quantities of letter mail.

4. Because of defects, carelessness on the part of operators, and accidents, the tubes soil or damage thousands of letters each year and in many instances entirely destroy others, thus resulting in many complaints and great inconvenience and loss to the public.

5. Less than 50 per cent of the letter mail, or 5 per cent of the entire volume of mail handled at the stations having pneumatic tubes, is transported by the tubes. If they were abandoned practically all of this mail could be handled more expeditiously and at less than one-third the cost by other means and large quantities of mail now delayed by the tubes advanced.

6. Notwithstanding the small quantity of mail transported by tube, the cost per mile is more than the entire amount paid for carrying the mail on all railroads entering New York, three times as much as is paid those entering Boston, and one-sixth as much as the entire cost of the screen wagon, automobile, city delivery, and collection vehicle service for all the cities of the United States.

7. The cost of transporting mail by tube is excessive and an extravagant waste of public funds. Investigation shows that in Philadelphia it costs approximately 13½ cents for each letter advanced by tube. What is true in Philadelphia is equally true in other cities. This is more expensive than special-delivery service.

8. Because of the unreliability and the inefficiency of the tubes, it has become necessary to divert a large quantity of mail formerly dispatched through them to automobiles wherever close connections are required. It has been found that later closings can be made and closer connections assured by means of automobiles. This is true even in the congested sections of New York City.

9. The tubes can not be maintained and operated for the sum mentioned in the amendment—$500,000 per annum. In their report Stone & Webster state that the average cost of operation for the past three and three-fourth years was $512,000 annually, and that the system can be operated by the Government for $453,000 annually. The average cost for the period mentioned is not a proper standard by which to measure present and future cost. Because of war conditions, increased wages and shorter hours of Government employment, the tubes can not be operated for $500,000 per annum. No provision is made for depreciation or maintenance of the tubes, which are fast deteriorating and which will have to be rebuilt long before final payment has been made. It will be necessary to ask for a large deficiency appropriation each year to operate and maintain the systems.

10. Under the proposed plan of payment the franchises will expire in some cities before the tubes are even paid for. In one instance the property will revert to the city, and the Government will be required by the law to pay for and operate the system after the property has reverted to the city.

11. Because under the proposed plan, assuming that the maximum price of $4,432,622 is paid for the tubes, 11 years will have expired before final payment can be made, thus expending approximately $11,000,000, for which the Government will acquire and be compelled to operate 56 miles of worthless junk and because of its use delay millions of letters annually.

12. The Government is under no moral obligation to purchase the tubes or continue their use on a rental basis, a fact that is admitted by the tube owners. This is even more apparent when it is known that the department has already paid more than $11,000,000 in rental for the tubes now in use, which is twice the estimated cost of construction.

13. The department would be compelled to purchase and hereafter operate the present obsolete pneumatic-tube systems, notwithstanding the fact that better means of underground transportation may be obtained. Even at this time the department has under consideration the utilization of subways for the transportation of all mail in the congested portions of the city of New York.

14. The proposed manner of purchase is not as favorable to the Government as that offered by one of the tube companies to the department in 1916, when it was stated that they expected to realize only that degree of value which the tubes possess to the Government service. They did not even ask that they be purchased at their physical value. To this offer the department replied that the tubes had so little utility value to the service that they would not be accepted as a gift.

The Post Office Department, because of war conditions, is conducting the Postal Service under many handicaps. Efficient postal service is of the utmost importance to the public, and its efficiency should not be intentionally impaired by requiring the purchase and further use of these tubes, which, in the opinion of those responsible for the Postal Service, as statements submitted to the commission show, are archaic, worn out, and useless junk.

At this critical period in the history of our country I think that we should conserve its resources and not expend large sums of money in a useless or wasteful manner at a time when our people are called upon, and will no doubt continue to be called upon, to make great sacrifices. The purchase of these tubes is so strongly protested against by the experts of the Postal Service, by the postmasters and supervisory officials at the offices where the tubes are operated, that I sincerely regret that your commission did not summon these persons before it and hear from them the many sound reasons why the tubes should be abandoned. That their judgment in this respect is sound is confirmed by the fact that the merchants of Boston more than 15 years ago abandoned the use of the 5 miles of tube built by them for underground transportation. The judgment of these officials is further corroborated by the opinion reached by a commission appointed by the postmaster general of Great Britain which visited this country several years ago to investigate the pneumatic-tube systems in use here and which reported to their Government that our tube system was no more efficient than the ordinary road van used on the streets of London.

In conclusion I wish to again earnestly protest against any appropriation being made for the purchase, operation, or rental of the present pneumatic-tube systems and urge that the use of these tubes be abandoned.

May I not ask that this letter be inserted in the RECORD when the item carrying this appropriation is under consideration, so that it may be a matter of public record that no person connected with the Postal Service is in any way responsible for unloading this valueless property on the Government, but, on the contrary, that the department and the postal officials consistently opposed such action.

Respectfully,

(Signed) A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. KIRBY. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a reply to that letter, signed by the three Members of the Senate who were members of the commission appointed last year to make investigation and report to Congress with respect to the pneumatic-tube mail service.

Mr. KIRBY. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears no objection, and that letter also will be inserted in the RECORD.

The letter referred to is as follows:

[Copy of letter sent to all Senators.]

MAY 2, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The undersigned Senate Members of the commission appointed last year to make investigation and report to Congress with respect to the pneumatic-tube mail service in six of the largest cities, regret the necessity for calling attention to a recent personal letter addressed to each Member of the Senate by the Postmaster General, in which he protests the action of five of the six members of that commission, who, after a most thorough and comprehensive investigation covering a period of more than ten months, have recommended the purchase of the pneumatic-tube systems contrary to the pronounced views of the Postmaster General.

The Postmaster General, apparently not content with having repeatedly recommended the abandonment of tube service, both in annual reports to Congress and by special communications and statements to the press, attempts further to influence the action of Senators, and, under the guise of seeking to put the department on record as protesting the action of the commission, addresses a personal letter to each Senator, which, aside from a number of glaring misstatements of facts, presents arguments against the utility value of the tubes which he and his assistants have heretofore repeatedly submitted to Congress, every one of which were presented by the department to the commission and after careful consideration were decided adversely to the contention of the department. In the letter he makes special request that it be inserted in the RECORD during consideration of the subject by the Senate.

The commission not only did not ignore the department during its investigation, but, on the contrary, and at the very outset, requested the Postmaster General to designate one of his experts, having knowledge of tube service, to assist the commission, which was done, and that expert rendered the commission valuable service. On the occasion of each visit of inspection the department was requested to detail an expert to accompany the commission, which was done. The two men, who were present at different times during each investigation, were both members of the departmental committee in 1915 appointed by the Postmaster General to investigate and report on tube service, and who reported, in October 1917, that the service should be abandoned with the exception of the service in New York City, where they recommended its retention.

In each tube city the postmaster was requested to accompany the commission and from three to five of the supervisory officials in each office also accompanied the commission and were present throughout the entire investigation.

The commission, not content with the abundant evidence previously submitted by the department and the reports of its experts, but desiring to have the full benefit of everything the Postmaster General had on the subject, compiled and published every official report concerning tube service since its establishment in 1893 to the present, which included every private and departmental report, even remotely bearing on the subject, that the department could furnish, much of it not heretofore made public, among which is a late report by a special departmental committee on the feasibility of large tubes in New York City.

In addition, the department, at the request of the commission, submitted, under date of January 10, 1918, a statement of its reasons against tube service, in which are included the latest reports to the Postmaster General by the postmasters in tube cities, and their supervisory officials, concerning tube service, among them being a report by a corps of post-office inspectors who spent several months investigating tube service in New York City.

These reports were published and considered by the commission prior to its report to Congress, and have been sent to each Senator and Member of Congress. They contain in substance and specifically every reason assigned by the Postmaster General in the letter addressed to you for his position against the acquisition of the service by the Government. The implied statement in his letter, expressing regret that the commission did not summon his officials having knowledge of the subject, and that thereby the position of the department was ignored, can not be construed other than an attempt to prejudice the minds of Senators and to discredit the report of the commission.

Aside from the statements that the cost of advancing each letter in Philadelphia is 13½ cents, and that the cost per mile of tube service is greater than the cost of carrying the mail on all railroads entering New York, three times as much as paid those entering Boston, and one-sixth of the entire cost of screen wagon, automobile, city delivery, and collection vehicle service, the various objections to tube service pointed out by the Postmaster General are discussed and considered in the report of the commission.

We believe the other statements referred to both as untrue and as having an unfair tendency to influence Senators, who have not the time to make independent investigation of the facts, to vote against the recommendations of the commission and the Senate Post Office Committee. The Postmaster General in his letter emphasizes the franchise rights to be acquired, under the legislation proposed, notwithstanding that the report of the commission discusses that feature and points out that no value is attached to franchise rights since the Government is not required to procure a franchise, and the legislation proposed specifically provides that no franchise condition imposing a charge shall be recognized.

In the city of Chicago, under the terms of the present franchise, the property in the streets shall vest in the city in 1923. The legislation proposed directs the Interstate Commerce Commission, in fixing the valuation of the systems, to take into consideration such a situation as exists in Chicago. The city council of that city recently adopted an ordinance requesting Congress to continue the tube service.

The present attitude of the Postmaster General regarding tube service is contrary to the judgment of each predecessor in office; of five congressional investigating committees, including one as late as 1914, of which Senator HOKE SMITH was chairman, and Hon. Joseph Stewart, regarded as the best authority on postal affairs in this country, was a member; and of the expression of every commercial, civic, and business organization concerned in the public welfare of the cities involved that has taken the trouble or the time to investigate the question. During the hearings in each city not a protest was raised against the service, but, to the contrary, all earnestly contended that street congestion, delays, and the uncertainty of automobile service, especially during periods of severe storms, and the importance of quick, reliable, and constantly available collection and delivery of first-class mail made it imperative that the tubes be retained.

Your careful attention is invited to the report of the commission, including that of the engineers, who, with a corps of assistants, spent several months investigating the entire subject.

Yours, respectfully,

J. H. BANKHEAD,
THOMAS W. HARDWICK,
JOHN W. WEEKS,
(Signed) By J. H. BANKHEAD,
Chairman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I also desire to have inserted in the RECORD an answer to the statements of the Postmaster General.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Answer to statements which the Postmaster General, in a letter addressed to the chairman of the Senate Post Office Committee and each Member of the Senate, dated April 23, 1918, gives as reasons for protesting against the enactment of an amendment in the current Post Office appropriation bill, approved by the Senate Post Office Committee, which provides for the purchase and operation of the pneumatic-tube mail service by the Government on and after July 1, 1918.]

NOTE.—All of the information now given in the Postmaster General's letter was presented at public hearings before the House and Senate Post Office Committees last year and also before Congress during the consideration of the post office bill. Congress at that time decided after careful consideration to appoint a joint commission of its own to investigate the subject. This same information was then presented to the joint commission of three Senators and three Representatives. This commission decided after most careful consideration that the information was not based upon fact, and they have recommended after a most complete investigation, in which they were aided by expert engineers and auditors, that the Government should purchase and operate these tubes. The Postmaster General now ignores the recommendations of this impartial commission and the unanimous views of the public and the press and again advances these same statements by sending copies of the letter in question to all Senators.

STATEMENT I.

"The tubes are unnecessary and a hindrance to efficient operation of the Postal Service. The volume of all classes of mail has so greatly increased and surface transportation so greatly improved, both as to speed and frequency, that the tubes are no longer of value. This is illustrated by the fact that in 1913 it was estimated that 5,373,147 letters were 'advanced' daily through the use of the tubes, while in 1915 only 2,837,638, or about one-half, were 'advanced.' No doubt this ratio of reduction has continued, and, if so, there is now little or no mail 'advanced' by the tubes, notwithstanding the fact that the screen-wagon schedules are arranged so as to secure the greatest advantage of the tubes."

The commission concluded (p. 1), after careful analysis of the testimony, holding public hearings, inspecting the tubes, and considering the reports of its engineers, auditors, and the final briefs submitted by the owners and the Post Office Department "that the tubes as now installed for carrying letter mail are necessary for proper postal service, and should be continued. * * *"

The volume of mail has undoubtedly increased, and particularly the parcel-post mail. The tubes, however, were constructed for the sole purpose of facilitating the delivery of letter mail. The commission's engineers, Stone and Webster, say (p. 3): "No number of automobiles, even at a cost exceeding that of the best-combined automobile and tube service, could obtain all of the advantages of a combined service." (Of tubes and automobiles.)

Twenty-four million eight hundred and twenty nine thousand and twelve letters are carried daily by the tubes, according to the Post Office records (p. 21), also three to five million letters are "advanced" or make connections every day, which would be lost by any other means of transportation. "The commission (p. 3) feels that the additional cost for providing expedition for these amounts of mail is fully justified."

As to the statement that 5,373,147 letters were "advanced" daily through the use of the tubes in 1914, while in 1915 only 2,837,638, or about one-half were "advanced," this statement is not true, according to the Post Office records, and, moreover, the two years are not comparable. The actual number of letters "advanced" daily in 1915 was 4,649,976, for the Postmaster General in his figures omitted the amount of mail which was "advanced" by tube in Boston. Also the per day count of all-letter mail in 1915 is less than the count in 1913, due undoubtedly to the fact that the 1915 figures were taken during the two lightest mailing days of the light mailing month of August and also during a period of decided business depression. It would therefore follow that if the total number of letters mailed in 1915 were less than the total number of letters mailed in 1913 the opportunity for "advancing" mail would be less in 1915 than in 1913.

Undoubtedly the volume of parcel-post and paper mail has increased, but this has no bearing on the use of the tubes, as, obviously, the letter mail should not be treated in the same way as the inferior classes of mail. While frequency of surface transportation may have increased because of the growth of bulk mail, it is self-evident that there has been no abatement in the congestion of the streets of the principal cities. It is therefore impossible that the speed of transportation can have increased.

STATEMENT II.

"Because of their limited capacity the tubes can not be used to meet emergent conditions, and for that reason delay millions of letters annually."

The Postmaster General stated last year as his chief objection against the pneumatic tubes their alleged limited capacity, claiming "the capacity of each container is limited to 5 pounds" and "the rapidity of dispatch to about 15-second intervals."

The commission has, therefore, given particular attention to this point, and finds by its own observations, as well as from the report of its engineers (p. 133), that the carriers, instead of being limited to about 5 pounds will actually carry an average of 8 pounds, and that with "a little care 11½ pounds of ordinary mail was easily put into a container." As to the rapidity of dispatch, 10 seconds was found to be the usual interval, and the engineers state "there seems to be no reason why this setting, or even a lower one, can not be used when desirable."

The pneumatic tubes have a maximum capacity of 200,000 letters per hour for each line of tubes. Their carrying capacity is, therefore, far beyond the output or working capacity of every post office with which they connect.

Because of this flexibility in the matter of its capacity, the pneumatic tubes have not only met "emergent conditions," but have overcome them so that the business communities of New York and Chicago during the severe storms of December, 1917, and January and February, 1918, received their mail with regularity. Stone & Webster say (p. 131): "After the recent storm in New York, December 13, 1917, motor-vehicle service was completely demoralized for several days * * * and without the pneumatic tubes vast quantities of first-class mail would have been seriously delayed." This same condition existed in Chicago and in the other cities. In Chicago, for example, during certain days of this winter absolutely no automobile service was provided The Government-owned automobile service in New York City is even now in a chaotic condition, and during the months of January, February, and the early part of March its presence could hardly justify the term "service," because, though an automobile might leave a postal station, no one, not excepting postal officials, dared say where it would stop or when it would return. Yet the mail reached the addressee. And that feat was accomplished by means of the pneumatic tube and because the pneumatic tube had met and overcome an "emergent condition."

The statement that the tubes delay millions of letters annually is at total variance with the facts. The Post Office records themselves show that the tubes permit three to five million letters of the 24,000,000 letters which they carry to make connections every day which otherwise would be missed Moreover, the Post Office Department has always had vehicular service as well as tube service at its disposal, and if it were possible that the pneumatic tubes were delaying mail, the department would certainly send this mail by vehicles. If mail is delayed, the fault is in the way in which the Post Office utilizes the tube service and not in the tubes themselves. This fact is borne out by the investigation of Stone & Webster, who, referring to certain alleged delays in Philadelphia, state: "These delays are consequently not due particularly to the tubes as such but to the conditions under which they are used"

STATEMENT III.

"Because of their unreliability, due to breakdowns and stoppages, the tubes cease operation for hours and even days at a time, and it is often necessary to dig up the streets to obtain the mail clogged in the tubes. When this occurs it is necessary to immediately substitute vehicle service, which results in confusion of schedules, thereby disorganizing the transportation and delivery services and causing delay to large quantities of letter mail."

The commission's engineers, Stone & Webster, say in this connection (p. 131): "Relative reliability.—Irregularities of tube service from accidental causes are less frequent than similar irregularities of motor-vehicle service, but are more serious when they do occur," and they conclude "that on the whole the tubes probably delay less mail from accidental causes than would automobiles." They further add: "It is obvious that there is a great advantage in this respect in having both systems, as they are adversely affected by entirely different causes, and this would be especially true with both under complete control of the Government so that their duplication would be most effective."

"The operating records of the pneumatic-tube companies show that their service is as near perfect as any mechanical service possibly could be." The engineers, Stone and Webster, say in this connection (p. 113): "As a mechanical device we find the pneumatic tubes to be a well-developed mechanism," and "the records of interruptions to tube service show them to be due almost entirely to the element of human operation. There are practically no interruptions to the service due to the plant or its design."

STATEMENT IV.

"Because of defects, carelessness on the part of operators, and accidents, the tubes soil or damage thousands of letters each year, and in many instances entirely destroy others, thus resulting in many complaints and great inconvenience and loss to the public."

The engineers, Stone and Webster, say (p. 121): "Damage to mail in tubes.—* * * An occasional letter may become soiled by accidental dropping upon the floor, which is more or less greasy about the tube terminals. In rare instances tube containers are improperly closed through carelessness of an operator and may open in the tube in transit. In such an event the contents of the containers are liable to spill out into the tube, be pushed along by the following container, and much of it badly soiled and damaged. The total amount of mail so damaged is, however, very little."

STATEMENT V.

"Less than 50 per cent of the letter mail, or 5 per cent of the entire volume of mail handled at the stations having pneumatic tubes, is transported by the tubes. If they were abandoned, practically all of this mail could be handled more expeditiously and at less than one-third the cost by other means, and large quantities of mail now delayed by the tubes advanced."

The records prepared by the Post Office Department for Stone and Webster (p. 119) show that the pneumatic tubes "transport 72 per cent of the letter mail in New York during the hours the tubes are in operation, and in these records no deductions were made for the mail transported to and from stations not connected with tubes. Also in Chicago the records show that 61 per cent of the mail was carried, and here no allowance was made for mail handled during the hours the tubes were not in operation" (p. 119). Stone and Webster further say that they see no reason why under Government ownership the tubes should not be operated constantly—that is, during the 24 hours of the day. If this were done, the percentage of mail carried by tubes would be much higher than at present, and under proper postal operation there would seem to be no reason why the tubes could not carry all of the first-class mail.

As to the statement of the Postmaster General that "if the tubes were abandoned practically all the mail could be handled more expeditiously and at less than one-third the cost by other means and large quantities now delayed by the tubes advanced," Stone and Webster say (p. 114): "We find that unquestionably the pneumatic tubes render first-class mail certain postal service that can not be equaled by any other existing facility. They estimate that the extra expense of tube service under Government operation, as compared with the cost of necessary automobile service to replace the tubes if discontinued, would be about $312 per day. The commission therefore concludes (p. 4): "That for this sum Congress can well afford to provide this special service for three to five million letters daily that are enabled thereby to reach their destination earlier, which would not be true if the tube service were dispensed with."

STATEMENT VI.

"Notwithstanding the small quantity of mail transported by tubes, the cost per mile is more than the entire amount paid for carrying the mail on all railroads entering New York, three times as much as is paid those entering Boston, and one-sixth as much as the entire cost of the screen wagon, automobile, city delivery, and collection vehicle service for all the cities of the United States."

The commission noted a somewhat similar statement in the last annual report of the Postmaster General, as follows: "The rental—$17,000 per mile—is more than the total amount per mile per annum paid for carrying the mail on all railroads entering New York City. * * *

It is to be noted that the Postmaster General now states that this tube rate per mile per annum is "more than the entire amount paid for carrying the mail on all railroads entering New York." It is obvious that this statement is incorrect and is misleading. Moreover, the commission can see no reason for a comparison between railroads to whom the carrying of all classes of mail is an incident and the tubes, which are used exclusively for first-class mail and are available every 10 seconds in the day for that purpose. The real criterion would seem to be whether or not the expense of $312 a day is warranted if 3,000,000 to 5,000,000 letters are thereby permitted to make connection they otherwise would miss, to say nothing of the other 20,000,000 letters which the tubes on this basis of figuring would carry without expense to the Government.

STATEMENT VII.

"The cost of transporting mail by tubes is excessive and an extravagant waste of public funds. Investigation shows that in Philadelphia it cost approximately 13½ cents for each letter 'advanced' by tube. What is true in Philadelphia is equally true in other cities. This is more expensive than special-delivery service."

This is an absurd misstatement of fact as far as the cost per letter "advanced" is concerned, and is an absolute misstatement when it points out that "what is true in Philadelphia is equally true in other cities."

The letters "advanced" or particularly benefited by tubes in Philadelphia during the count of 1913 amounted to 832,435 letters a day, while in the count of 1915 they amounted to but 60,591 letters a day. This clearly indicates an incorrect count, for the total number of letters "advanced" in all tube cities in 1913 amounted to 5,375,147 letters a day as compared with 4,649,976 in 1915; nevertheless the Postmaster General says "what is true in Philadelphia is equally true in other cities." But using the figures given for Philadelphia, viz, 60,591 letters per day actually benefited and charging the entire cost of the tube system to these letters, the cost per letter amounts to a little over 7 mills and not to 13½ cents, as stated by the Postmaster General. Moreover, the average cost of advancing or benefiting letters in all the cities, including Philadelphia, instead of being the same as in Philadelphia, amounts to but approximately one-half mill per letter instead of 13½ cents, or, in other words, 135 mills. The tubes themselves, as already stated, carry approximately 25,000,000 letters a day, and the cost of carrying a single letter is a little more than one-tenth of a mill, or at the rate of, say, 91 letters for 1 cent.

STATEMENT VIII.

"Because of the unreliability and the inefficiency of the tubes it has become necessary to divert a large quantity of mail formerly dispatched through them to automobiles wherever close connections are required. It has been found that later closings can be made and closer connection assured by means of automobiles. This is true even in the congested sections of New York City."

The commission, through its engineers, has had careful investigation made of this statement, and can not find it to be borne out by the facts or by the records of the Post Office Department. Stone & Webster report that under a 10-second headway the tubes carry 144,000 letters an hour, and that by increasing the dispatch to 8 seconds the capacity would be increased to 180,000 letters per hour. "Obviously this amount, in the ordinary flow of first-class mail, would accumulate only infrequently" (p. 19).

The use to which the penumatic tubes are put depends entirely upon the Post Office Department. They can use them or not as they please. Stone & Webster say in this connection (p. 120): "When the mails which require tube service for expedition become so large that some is delayed by lack of tube capacity, then increase of tube facilities can well be considered. Until that time there would seem to be no reason for the frequent recurrence of actual delays to mails on account of the tubes."

STATEMENT IX.

"The tubes can not be maintained and operated for the sums mentioned in the amendment—$500,000 per annum. In their report Stone & Webster state that the average cost of operation for the past four and three-fourths years was $512,000 annually, and the system can be operated by the Government for $453,000 annually. The average cost for the period mentioned is not a proper standard by which to measure present and future cost. Because of war conditions, increased wages, and shorter hours of Government employment the tubes can not be operated for $500,000 per annum. No provision is made for depreciation or maintenance of the tubes, which are fast deteriorating and which will have to be rebuilt long before final payment has been made. It will be necessary to ask for a large deficiency appropriation each year to operate and maintain the systems."

Stone & Webster estimate that before the war the Government could have operated the pneumatic tubes, on an eight-hour basis, paying Government wages and using more men than are used by the tube company, for approximately $453,000 per year. The additional $47,000 provided, therefore, would appear to be sufficient to cover increases in costs of materials and labor. In fact, in the minority report the Post Office authorities estimate that they should have but $25,000 to cover "Excess in salaries of tube operators, laborers, engineers, machinists, and supervising officials." In the engineer's estimated cost of operation is contained necessary items for all maintenance and for the usual depreciation of machinery and equipment excepting the tube itself, which, in their opinion, will last upward of 50 years. They say in this connection (p. 122): "As we believe that the pipe and street work which makes up the greater part of the total investment should have a physical life of more than 50 years, and as the oldest part of the present tube system was installed about 25 years ago, our opinion is that such extraordinary repairs would be negligible for more than 25 years. During this period, therefore, it would not be necessary to make any regular annual appropriation on account of depreciation."

STATEMENT X.

"Under the proposed plan of payment the franchises will expire in some cities before the tubes are even paid for. In one instance the property will revert to the city, and the Government will be required by the law to pay for and operate the system after the property has reverted to the city."

"The commission does not consider that the conditions or limitations of the franchise or street rights exercised by the tube companies would affect the right of the Government to maintain, operate, and extend underground pneumatic-tube mail service in the event that the systems now in operation should be acquired by it and operated as a part of the Postal Service." (P. 39.)

"The commission has allowed nothing in its estimates for franchises, since it believes that the Government itself would have no difficulty in securing and perhaps would not need to secure a franchise from the cities to operate or to extend the existing pneumatic tubes, and that the tube companies themselves must necessarily sell to the Government whatever rights they have in the streets to properly convey their properties to the Government as they now exist.

"The question has also arisen in connection with the rights of the company to property in the streets of the city of Chicago—whether or not the Chicago company, which has an unusual franchise arrangement with the city, can convey to the Government an unencumbered title to properties in the streets. Under the terms of the franchise the properties of the company in the streets and alleys revert to the city in 1928. The company claims that this provision was inserted into the franchise merely to protect the city; that the company would have no difficulty in securing an extension of the franchise; and that if the Government acquires the properties of the company it should have no difficulty in securing a release from the city of whatever rights the city may have in the tubes, and will therefore guarantee to the Government a clear title, making whatever arrangements are necessary in that connection with the city of Chicago." (P. 41.)

STATEMENT XI.

"Because under the proposed plan, assuming the maximum price of $4,432,622 is paid for the tubes, 11 years will have expired before final payment can be made, thus expending approximately $11,000,000 for which the Government will acquire and be compelled to operate 56 miles of worthless junk, and because of its use delay millions of letters annually."

Under the plan proposed by the commission not only will there be no increase in cost to the Government over the present rentals paid for pneumatic-tube service, but in addition the Government will purchase the tube systems on an installment basis in such a manner that in slightly over 10 years, assuming the maximum estimated price is paid for the tubes, the Government will own them for the same amount that it is now paying for a 10-year rental period.

As to the statement that the tubes are "worthless junk," the Post Office Department say in their brief (p. 64): "The department is without data gathered by its own representatives upon which to base a physical valuation of the pneumatic-tube properties and equipment in any one of the cities where tubes are operated." Stone & Webster say in this connection (p. 113): "The amount of money spent for maintenance of the machinery has been relatively small, yet the equipment appears to be in good operating condition. We had opportunity to examine the underground pipes at several points and found no evidences of deterioration." Also on page 117: "We believe all the tube systems to be in excellent operating condition."

STATEMENT XII.

"The Government is under no moral obligation to purchase the tubes or continue their use on a rental basis, a fact that is admitted by the tube owners. This is even more apparent when it is known that the department has already paid more than $11,000,000 in rental for the tubes now in use, which is twice the estimated cost of construction."

The commission does not understand that the tube owners have ever admitted that the Government is under no moral obligation to purchase the tubes, but that they have said that they would waive that point in view of their decided opinion that any impartial commission would decide that the tubes did have value to the Post Office Department and should be owned by the Government. The tube owners insist that the tube service was made possible only by the action of Congress and the Post Office Department in indorsing and requesting that character of service, and only after the needs and advisability of the service had been approved, as each tube line was constructed. They state that large investments of private capital have been made in the tube properties with the implied understanding, at least, that long-time leases would be made or the system purchased by the Government, thereby protecting the investors. (P. 33.)

STATEMENT XIII.

"The department would be compelled to purchase and hereafter operate the present obsolete pneumatic-tube systems, notwithstanding the fact that better means of underground transportation may be obtained. Even at this time the department has under consideration the utilization of subways for the transportation of all mail in the congested portions of the city of New York."

The engineers' report clearly shows that the pneumatic tubes have ample capacity to carry the letter mail, for which purpose alone they were constructed. The commission had full knowledge that the Post Office Department has tried to secure permission to carry mails in the subways of New York City. To do this, however, mail would have to be transported from the post offices to the subway, and again from the subway back to the post offices. This is practically the method that was used some years ago in connection with the elevated railways and it was found to be far from satisfactory.

It is also extremely doubtful if the transportation companies would agree to carry mail in this way, as is indicated by the statement of J. H. Neal, vice president of the Boston Elevated Railway, as follows (p. 29): "One thing as to the use of rapid-transit lines: You should not consider that seriously as an alternative for the tube service, for the reason that the rapid-transit line is built primarily for the transit of passengers. If you should interfere by placing pouches on the trains, with just one single train, or 3 per cent, you have in effect deducted 3 per cent on $12,000,000. Our rapid-transit lines are not in position to handle that sort of business."

STATEMENT XIV.

"The proposed manner of purchase is not as favorable to the Government as that offered by one of the tube companies to the department in 1916, when it was stated that they expected to realize only that degree of value which the tubes possess to the Government service. They did not even ask that they be purchased at their physical value. To this offer the department replied that the tubes had so little utility value to the service that they would not be accepted as a gift."

The commission considers this an absolute misrepresentation of a letter from the American Pneumatic Service Co., which is a matter of public record. (See p. 32 of Briefs.) In this letter the company state that they expect to realize only the value which the tubes possess to the Government Mail Service, but they add that they should expect this value to be determined by some impartial tribunal. The department's reply also applied only to the cities of Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, and St. Louis, and not to New York, where over one-half the total tube mileage is located. At that time the department was recommending the continuance of the New York system.

The present commission has concluded in that connection:

"1. Pneumatic tubes as now installed for carrying letter mail are necessary for proper postal service, and should be continued in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, and St. Louis * * *."

In fact, every investigating commission and every Postmaster General, until the present administration, has been in favor of the continuance and extension of the pneumatic-tube service.

The commission gave full consideration to the fact that because of war conditions the Postal Service is being conducted under many handicaps. It believes in this connection that nothing should be done which would retard the delivery of important letter mail, and it considers that rapid transmission of first-class mail should be provided independent of and divorced from the common or less important and lower classes of mail (p. 3).

As to the statement "that in the opinion of those responsible for the Postal Service the tubes are archaic, worn out, and useless junk," the commission considers that this statement is in no way borne out by the facts as disclosed by the report of the engineers of this commission and of previous commissions, and they state in this connection (p. 18): "An examination of these reports submitted since the organization of this commission and since the attitude of the department in opposition to tube service became so pronounced impresses one that a strained attempt is made to marshal facts and arguments in such manner as to support a predetermined conclusion rather than an effort to present each phase of the subject and logically reason a conclusion therefrom," and also "statements of fact are advanced with respect to tube and automobile service which the commission is not prepared to accept, having in mind their own investigation and observation * * *." And further (p. 19): "It is interesting and worthy of notice that though apparently every supervisory official in the post office in Chicago signed with approval the report concerning tube service in that city, members of the commission are advised that in private conversation some of these gentlemen stated that in their personal opinion the tubes were a valuable adjunct to the postal equipment of that city."

Decided exception can be taken to the statement that the commission did not summon before it post-office officials and hear from them "the many sound reasons why the tubes should be abandoned." The commission had before it all the testimony which was submitted by postal officials at the public hearings held before the House and Senate Post Office Committees last year. These hearings consumed four days before the House committee and six days before the Senate committee, and the testimony was heard in its entirety by members of the commission. Not only that, but a postal expert was assigned to the commission by the Postmaster General and accompanied it on its tour of investigation. Also, members of the commission personally conferred with the postmasters and post-office employees directly concerned with the operation of the tubes. The engineers of the commission, Stone & Webster, spent some six months in their investigations in the post offices at New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Chicago, Philadelphia, and St. Louis and made as thorough an investigation of the subject as has ever been undertaken. Every record of the Post Office Department was put at their disposal and these were not only carefully examined, but were gone over in detail with the officials directly concerned and the ones the Postmaster General quotes in his statements.

Finally, the commission requested the Post Office Department to submit a brief giving in detail all the information which they had in regard to pneumatic tubes, and this brief of some 181 printed pages (see pp. 64–245 in volume of briefs) was so submitted by First Assistant Postmaster General Koons on January 10.

As to the statement that the merchants of Boston more than 15 years ago abandoned the use of 5 miles tubes built by them for underground transportation, this is an absolute misstatement of fact, as is well known by the Post Office Department and is shown by their records.

The tubes in question were built by the Boston Pneumatic Transit Co., which at the present time has the contract for carrying mails by pneumatic tubes in Boston. They were first constructed for carrying parcels in connection with a wagon delivery system. The Post Office Department at that time was most anxious to acquire tubes for transporting the mails, and after investigation by postal experts and proper advertisement these tubes were rebuilt and connected with the post offices and since that time have been used in the Postal Service. The first contract for these tubes expired in 1906, and at that time, after a most careful investigation by postal experts, a new 10-year contract was made for these tubes in connection with the other tubes which are used in the Boston postal system. The merchants of Boston had nothing to do either with the construction of these tubes nor with abandoning their use for carrying parcels.

The statement is made that a commission appointed by the postmaster general of Great Britain, which visited this country several years ago to investigate the pneumatic-tube system in use here, reported to their Government that the tube system was no more efficient than the ordinary road van used on the streets of London.

The report of this commission was submitted to the Senate Post Office Committee last year and the conclusions there given, instead of being as stated, were to the effect that in addition to recommending the carrying of letter mail by pneumatic tubes, such as are used in this country, the commission recommended that tunnels large enough to carry parcel post and bulk mail be constructed between three of the most important post offices in the city of London; also that tubes, such as are used in this country, be hung in these tunnels, where it was possible to do so, and elsewhere be laid beneath the streets, as is the practice in this country.

The 1914 congressional tube commission, of which Hon. HOKE SMITH was chairman, and Second Assistant Postmaster General Joseph Stewart, a member, said:

"The utility and general advantage of the use of pneumatic tubes has been approved and commended by all commissions, whether composed wholly or in part of postal officials. Practical experience with the service appears to have justified the opinions so expressed."

Five of the six members of the present commission, including the three Senators, have reached the same conclusions which are also borne out by the findings of the commission's engineers—Stone & Webster. The views of the Postmaster General are expressed in the report submitted by one member of the commission.

The Postmaster General indicates by his persistency that his interest in this piece of legislation is made merely personal and not based upon benefits to accrue for the general condition of the country. He ignores the fact that a joint commission of Senators and Congressmen carefully examined all of his contentions and rendered an unbiased opinion relative to the pneumatic tubes as a utility of benefit to a wide circle of our citizens, and particularly to the business activity of our country. Any method of mail transmission which expedites the letter in its transportation career aids commerce just that much in its effect upon production These conditions must be borne in mind and were considered by the commission during the investigation of the pneumatic-tube mail service.

The commission feels that its investigation of the pneumatic tube as a property and as a utility was of wider range and freer pursuit than that of the committee of the Post Office Department on which the Postmaster General depends for his objections to the service.

Mr. KIRBY. Now, I ask unanimous consent further to insert in the RECORD a letter from the Postmaster General, dated May 8, in reply, I presume, to the letter which has just been inserted in the RECORD by the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 8, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM F. KIRBY,
United States Senate,

MY DEAR SENATOR KIRBY: There is inclosed copy of a letter which I have to-day written Senator BANKHEAD, chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, relative to the purchase of the pneumatic tubes, and trust you will have the time to read it carefully.

Sincerely, yours,

A. S. BURLESON.

MAY 8, 1918.

Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
Chairman Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR BANKHEAD: With further reference to my communication of the 6th instant relative to the letter written by you in which two other Senators joined, a copy of which you sent me, declaring that the statements contained in my letter of April 24, 1918, relative to the purchase of the pneumatic tubes were untrue, I wish to state that I have carefully read your letter of May 2, addressed to each of the Senators, and wish to reiterate in the most positive manner that every statement contained in my letter of April 24 is not only justified but is founded on facts.

In my letter of April 24 it was stated:

"The purchase of these tubes is so strongly protested against by the experts of the Postal Service, by the postmasters and supervisory officials at the offices where the tubes are operated, that I sincerely regret that your commission did not summon these persons before it and hear from them the many sound reasons why the tubes should be abandoned."

The department had every reason to expect that these persons would be summoned before your commission and examined so that the commission might ascertain for itself their views and the value of their judgment in this matter, but this was not done. In accordance with the request of the commission the department did detail an expert to accompany it to the various cities at the time the business organizations presented their views of the tube service. It was thoroughly understood, however, that the postal officials would not be heard at these hearings, but that they would be heard later at Washington. That these hearings were conducted entirely for the merchants is shown by the printed record in connection with the hearings in Philadelphia, when the chairman of the commission asked the representative of the department for some information, and Mr. Milholland stated:

"Mr. Chairman, if in order, I will say that this hearing was entirely for the merchants, and neither the post office nor the tube interests were to take part in it, and if the program be changed we should, of course, like the same opportunity to meet the post-office arguments that will be accorded to them."

After the most careful consideration of my letter of April 24, and notwithstanding the statements contained in yours of May 2, I must adhere to those contained therein, as they are based on the facts. The conclusion reached by the department that it would not be justified in accepting the tubes as a gift is entirely justified, for, as a matter of fact, they are a detriment to the service.

I am taking the liberty of sending a copy of this letter to each Senator for such influence as the statements contained herein may warrant, as it is considered in the interest of the Postal Service to do so.

Respectfully,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, we have had this investigation; there has been a divided report, as I have said, and the Postmaster General and the department complain that the commission refused to hear the experts on the part of the Post Office Department.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course, the Senator would like to have accurate information on that point?

Mr. KIRBY. Yes.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Postmaster General is entirely in error about that. The commission appointed by Congress to investigate the pneumatic-tube service invited and urged the Post Office Department to send us everything they had relating to it——

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me finish the statement, if the Senator does not object. The Post Office Department submitted one hundred and odd pages of printed matter setting out its position in respect to this matter. Every one of the reasons submitted by the department was carefully considered by the commission. The only possible basis on which the allegation of the Postmaster General in regard to this matter rests is this—and I get this information, of course, from the clerk to the commission—that one of the department officials volunteered, in case he was desired, to appear, in addition to the printed communication placed before the commission. He was asked, according to my understanding, if he had anything additional to submit other than that which was covered by the printed communication, and he said "no"; that he would merely come if the commission wanted him to do so, but that which had been submitted covered the case. I do not think, when the Senator is informed of the facts, that he ought to insist on making a statement like that. The department submitted 181 printed pages. I do not think the Postmaster General or the Senator from Arkansas ought to say that the commission refused or failed to give full hearing to the Post Office Department in this matter.

Mr. KIRBY. I have no disposition to question the good faith of the commission or its sound judgment or its discretion; but the Postmaster General does say what I have stated.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know the Postmaster General does, but he does not state the fact.

Mr. KIRBY. But the Postmaster General insists upon the statement being true, notwithstanding the statement of the commission.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know that; and I rather think it is not very courteous of the Senator to side with him on that issue of fact in the Senate.

Mr. KIRBY. I have no disposition, of course, to have any controversy with the commission; but it appears that there is a misunderstanding between the commission and the department about what the condition is, and the department has said "we did not submit the statement of our experts, because we thought we would have an opportunity to do so in Washington, which was not given."

Mr. HARDWICK. As a matter of fact they submitted 181 pages of printed matter.

Mr. KIRBY. I am talking about the opinions of experts.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is what the communication was; they all gave their opinions and reasons and the so-called facts on which they were based; and then, when they said they would send one of the very intelligent and able officials of the Post Office Department to supplement orally the previous communication, and the clerk asked if he had anything additional to say, and he said no, that it was all covered by the written communication, would the Senator feel, if he had been serving on the commission, that it was necessary to let him repeat orally what had been said in writing?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly not, if he had been heard; but afterwards, if he stated he had not been heard, I might have thought that I misunderstood the condition as it had developed.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KIRBY. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to call the Senator's attention to a concrete instance in denial of the statement made by the Postmaster General. In Boston, where I presided at the hearing, the postmaster at Boston, as the record will show, did appear and expressed the views of the department, and another representative of the department was there; one of the committee of five that made the original report on which the Postmaster General's action is based was sitting before the table during the hearing and was asked if he had anything he wished to say, and he said he did not have anything to say. I think the same general procedure was followed in every city where a hearing was held.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is true.

Mr. KIRBY. The letter that I have had printed in the RECORD shows that at a particular hearing some question was asked of some man representing the Post Office Department, and he said he did not understand that it was the purpose to introduce any evidence or give any information on behalf of the Post Office Department or of the tube owners then, but that the hearing was for the benefit of those who received the mail, as well as the merchants of the cities interested.

Mr. WEEKS. In that particular instance the commission was accompanied by nearly every supervising official of the city; at least two automobiles of Post Office officials accompanied the commission in its rounds, and they had every opportunity personally, privately, and otherwise to express their views.

Mr. KIRBY. Well, Mr. President, I do not question at all the commission's procedure, but it is most unfortunate for the Senate in the determination of a question important both to the mail service and to the Government that the department does not think that it had an opportunity to be heard.

I understand something about this system. The objections to it have been urged for a long time. We know that it only serves a part of the people and carries a part of the mail; we know that it is subject to breakdowns, and that when it does break down it delays all the mail carried in tubes, and it delays it for a long time. We know that it only carries one part of a particular class of mail, and advances that not greatly over the other deliveries at an enormous and unwarranted expense under any condition, as I see it.

Under the automobile system for carrying the mails, which is in force in all the cities, and which must be resorted to to carry all the mails that can not be carried in the tubes, if there is a mishap or breakdown another machine comes along and transports the mail without delay, but when one of these tubes breakdown it may be a week before it is found out where the trouble is, and all the mail is blocked where the obstruction occurs.

Those, it seems to me, are the conditions which have been shown to exist. Nobody is able to dispute that those are the facts. The Post Office Department says, "We do not want this system; it is archaic; it is worthless; it is worn out and useless junk." The expense of purchasing automobiles for carrying on this system of delivering the mail is inconsiderable, is negligible, as compared with the expense of buying these tubes. Why, then, should we buy them? I do not think it ought to be done. I do not think any good reason has been shown why it should be done. It certainly involves a great and useless expense, and we need all the money that can be saved for the prosecution of the war.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I have very little knowledge about the use of pneumatic tubes in any other place than the city of New York, but there, without exception, the business men who use the mails are in favor of the continuation of the pneumatic-tube system. Every business organization, the Chamber of Commerce, the Merchants' Association, the Board of Trade and Transportation, the Chamber of Commerce of Brooklyn, the Chamber of Commerce of The Bronx, in fact, every individual and organization connected with the business interests of the city of New York who has taken the trouble to investigate this question is firm in the conviction that this system should be continued.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] referred to the views of former Postmaster Morgan on the subject. Mr. Morgan was connected with the post-office service in New York City for a period of 43 years. He began his connection with it in 1873 and was postmaster for eight years. He continued to act as postmaster during the first four years of the present Postmaster General's administration, but was relieved in May of last year by the appointment of a gentleman of the Postmaster General's political faith. I have often wondered, Mr. President, if this great post-office official, who had been long the head of one of the most important business organizations in the Nation, was relieved because he disagreed so strongly with the Postmaster General in the matter of the use of pneumatic tubes.

Among other things that Mr. Morgan said in his testimony before the commission investigating the subject was this:

> It is my opinion that the continuation of the entire existing system of pneumatic tubes in New York City and Brooklyn is justified because of the rapid service which it provides for the transmission of mail, particularly of the first class. There are transmitted through such tubes about 80,000 pneumatic-tube carriers per day, carrying approximately 5,000,000 pieces of mail. These carriers travel at a rate of 30 miles per hour.

Mr. President, every man connected with the post office in the city of New York with whom I have talked—and I have taken the opportunity of conversing with many of them, all experts in their work—without exception advises that this service be continued.

Several days ago, having in mind this discussion, I wired the secretary of state of the State of New York, Hon. Francis M. Hugo, whose office issues the automobile licenses in our State, and asked him to advise me how many automobiles had been licensed in the city of New York. He wired me the figures, which are not confined entirely to the city of New York, but to what he terms the metropolitan district, which includes two of the small adjoining counties. These figures indicate that there are to-day in the city of New York over 150,000 automobiles, without regard to vehicles of other character.

I also asked the police commissioner of the city to advise me as to the number of accidents that occurred in the city of New York in the year 1917; and I hope Senators present will listen to these startling figures. The total number of accidents, Senators, in the year 1917 on the streets of the city of New York was 23,939; the number killed by automobiles in the streets of the city, 441; killed by other vehicles, 250; nonvehicular accidents, people killed, 23; a total of 714. The number of people injured by automobiles, 12,805; injured by other vehicles, 9,967; and injured in the streets of New York by accidents other than by vehicles, 2,663.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, does the Senator, in giving the figures of the number of automobiles, include trucks and delivery wagons?

Mr. CALDER. Yes. In the figures of 150,621 I include automobiles and motor trucks of every character. These figures show that there were 108,449 pleasure vehicles, 33,552 automobile trucks, 7,221 omnibuses, and 808 dealers' cars; all told, 150,621.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have noticed, in being transported from one station to another in New York City, that the danger of collision came largely from trucks and delivery wagons, much more so than from the ordinary automobile, and I wondered whether the Senator had included them in his figures.

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator what proportion of the figures which he gave refer to pleasure automobiles?

Mr. CALDER. One hundred and eight thousand four hundred and forty-nine out of 150,621.

Mr. KENYON. Has there been any diminution in the number of pleasure vehicles since the war?

Mr. CALDER. I can not answer the Senator's question definitely. Mr. President, when we say "pleasure automobiles"—and that is the language the Secretary of State uses—perhaps we do not state the case fairly, for undoubtedly many of the cars classed as pleasure automobiles are used in part for business. Many business men, in going from one part of the city to the other, utilize automobiles for that purpose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not only business men nowadays, but workingmen as well.

Mr. CALDER. I think that is true.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly so, in this city.

Mr. CALDER. Physicians, and so on, as my colleague points out. But, Mr. President, the streets of New York to-day are crowded to their utmost capacity. In fact, those who have made a study of the condition of our streets understand that they are now used far beyond their capacity. As my colleague [Mr. WADSWORTH] pointed out in his remarks on this subject a moment ago, we are building there vast underground railways, we are building overhead railways; in our effort to solve the railroad-terminal situation along our water front we propose having the railroads elevated, and, of couse, under the ground, too, where necessary; so that our streets to-day are used to their utmost capacity. The figures I have read, furnished by the police commissioner, of the vast number of people killed and the twenty thousand-odd injured in the streets of the city of New York indicate that vastly more people were killed and injured in the city of New York during the past year than were killed and wounded on our side in the Spanish-American War.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CALDER. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Do I understand from the Senator that if the Government buys these tubes there will be no more slaughter on the streets of New York?

Mr. CALDER. Of course, I do not contend that if the Government buys these tubes we are going to relieve the present situation in the city of New York; but I do insist that if we discontinue the use of them the number of killed and injured will be many times more than what it is to-day.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. CALDER. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. Does the Senator's information extend to the life of the franchise in New York under which these tubes are operated now?

Mr. CALDER. It is perpetual. The franchise given from the State permits the perpetual use of these tubes.

Mr. KIRBY. Then, the franchise for the operation in New York continues without further expense forever?

Mr. CALDER. As I understand, as far as the Government is concerned; yes.

Mr. KIRBY. The committee does not report that. That is what I was trying to get at.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I am not familiar with the details of the situation, except as far as the use of the tubes applies to the city of New York. Every single business institution of that city demands their continuance, and, Mr. President, this is not a local matter with New York City. That great center of the Nation's business is of as much interest to the rest of the country as it is to the people of New York. If you hamper our mail facilities, it will be indirectly reflected throughout the land.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. All of that may be true, but what bothers me about this thing is, why should we buy this old plant and take it over? Why can we not continue to lease it and run it as we have been doing?

I would be in favor of a leasing proposition, but it strikes me that this is a good deal like the proposition we have oftentimes encountered in connection with river and harbor improvements. Men start in to improve either a creek or a harbor, and say: "Give us a chance and we will do this at our own expense." By and by they get tired of it, and then they want to unload it on the Government. Is not this one of those schemes to unload a sickly plant onto the Government?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, we have all heard of such schemes as the Senator from Minnesota suggests; but, as I understand the project of taking over these tubes, the commission appointed as the result of an act of Congress have investigated the matter and come to the Senate to-day and tell us that for their rental for 10 years the Government can buy the whole system. If that is so, it would not only be much cheaper, but it would be good business from every standpoint for the Government to own the system itself. Then, in its operation, if it seems wise to extend it, that can be done. I know I speak for the people who use the mails and for those who have given the matter great thought, when I say that it would be most helpful to our mail facilities in New York, if it could be further extended. We have a tube crossing to Brooklyn from the old city of New York, extending to our general post office in Brooklyn and out to the end of the Long Island Railroad, a line that taps all of the villages and towns on Long Island, and to a large extent takes care of the mail facilities for a population of approximately 2,800,000 people. This tube that comes to Brooklyn transmits practically all of our first-class mail between Brooklyn and the general post office of Manhattan. Brooklyn now has a population of 2,000,000 people, and the outlying sections of Long Island nearly 800,000 more.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. CALDER. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator if he thinks there is any more room for trucks on the Brooklyn Bridge?

Mr. CALDER. I am glad that my colleague made the inquiry with regard to the opportunity for additional traffic on the bridges. I will say to the Senate that our bridge facilities crossing the East River, as far as wagon and automobile traffic is concerned, are utilized to the limit. If that traffic is materially increased we will have to build more bridges.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. CALDER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I want to disabuse the Senator's mind of one thing, and that is this: I am not anxious to deprive the city of New York of the use of the pneumatic-tube service; but that is one proposition. I am, however, utterly opposed to unloading this plant onto the Government. If the Senator will prepare an amendment requiring the Postmaster General to lease this property I will vote for it; but I am utterly opposed to buying it on the basis stated in this bill.

Mr. CALDER. I am glad that the Senator from Minnesota appreciates the problems we have in connection with the street traffic in New York City. As he probably knows, and as I am sure many Senators realize who have visited New York, because of the congestion of the traffic in many of the streets we have had to pass regulations whereby traffic should only go one way, and if one should walk up the important streets of the city any busy afternoon he would find that on many of them you can walk almost as fast as the traffic goes, for the carts and cars and wagons are stopped at every single block to permit traffic to cross from the side streets.

Not only is this service indorsed by the former postmaster of New York, Mr. Morgan, the former postmaster of Brooklyn, the postmasters of all the outlying sections of New York City, all the chambers of commerce and the boards of trade, and the people of New York City, but in addition to that we not only have the indorsement of the former mayor of our city, to whom my colleague has referred, but I have here an extract from a statement by the present mayor. He says:

> It has been brought to my attention that a proposal before your committee would mean the discontinuance of the pneumatic-tube service in New York City.
>
> Because of the delay caused by auto service and because of the congestion of traffic and the danger arising from it, and in view of the further fact that mail matter, particularly after a storm, is now delayed from 10 to 12 hours by the inability of the autos to move through the congested traffic, I would ask that any action looking to the discontinuance of this service be not taken by Congress.
>
> I further believe that Congress should provide for the continuance of this tube service for the reasons I have set forth.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. If this amendment is not adopted, does that mean that this service will be absolutely discontinued—that the Government can not lease and go ahead as it has been doing?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I do not understand that that is a fact. I have no doubt that some arrangement might be made by which we could continue the use of tubes in the big cities, particularly in New York City; but it has seemed to me that it would be a good business venture, in the interest of the Government, to take over the tube service, if it can be obtained on the terms laid down in the amendment.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CALDER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. The House, in preparing the Post Office appropriation bill this year did not include any appropriation for the continuance of the rental of the tubes, and it did not do so last year. The Senator from Iowa will recall that the Senate put in a provision for the continuance of the rental and also a proposition compelling the use of the tubes, because the same controversy arose last year.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me there? What was the appropriation that we put in last year?

Mr. WEEKS. I think it was $976,000.

Mr. NELSON. For operating?

Mr. WEEKS. For rental.

Mr. NELSON. For rental—for the use of the tubes?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Then, if the Senator will allow me, how do you account for the fact that Webster & Stone state that the system can be operated by the Government at an expenditure of $500,000? How do you account for that, when we appropriated nearly twice that much in the bill last year?

Mr. WEEKS. That is easily accounted for. It is estimated that it costs the company somewhat more to conduct the tube service than it would cost the Government, because it pays taxes, it has overhead expenses, it employs lawyers, and it does other things which every company must necessarily do; and it is believed that it costs the company about $100,000 more than it would cost the Government to operate the tubes. But the Senator must remember that there are some $7,000,000 invested in these tubes, and the difference, say, between $600,000 and whatever was paid is the return which is paid on that capital.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator allow me further?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I am asking for information. This proposition is to some extent a novelty to me. We appropriated last year $900,000, the Senator says, for operating this system?

Mr. WEEKS. Nine hundred and seventy-six thousand dollars.

Mr. NELSON. Nearly a million dollars?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. Was it operated by the Government?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, not at all; it was operated by the company.

Mr. NELSON. I mean, it was operated by the company?

Mr. WEEKS. For the Government.

Mr. NELSON. Did the company get this million dollars, or anywhere near it?

Mr. WEEKS. It got whatever was appropriated.

Mr. NELSON. Then can the Senator account for the fact that Webster & Stone estimate that it can be operated by the Government for half that sum? I want to say to the Senator that I asked this question because that seems to be the view of Webster & Stone. I have had some experience with that firm in the shipping investigation; and after I found that they had unloaded their chief engineer, to whom they were paying $12,000 a year, on the Government for twice that salary, I lost faith in the firm of Webster & Stone.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator has very pronounced views on that firm. I do not agree with him in those views, but I can very easily answer the question that he asks relative to the tubes. The cost of operating the tubes is somewhere from $450,000 to $600,000 a year, being the items to which I have referred; and the difference between the cost and the total rental is the return which goes to the stockholders or the bondholders of the tube companies.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me further—I am asking these questions for information—this amendment is based upon the idea that a given sum, something like $900,000 or a little over——

Mr. WEEKS. It is the same amount.

Mr. NELSON. Is to be appropriated in the future if the Government buys this plant; and then, in order to make it appear more easy for the Government to buy it, you claim that out of that annual appropriation it takes only $500,000 for the Government to operate it instead of a million dollars this last year, and you set aside the other imaginary amount of four hundred and some odd thousand dollars to buy this plant. Now, was not the low estimate of Webster & Stone made for the purpose of showing that there would be a surplus to buy this plant in 10 years?

Mr. WEEKS. The firm of Stone & Webster did not make any estimate at all of the value of the property. They had nothing to do with that. The estimate for the purchase of the property is based on a renewal value in normal times—not in war times, but in normal times—of $4,426,000; and if the same appropriation that has been made for the last 12 years is continued for 10 years on the basis that the commission reports, the Government will own the tubes at the end of 10 years, and it will not cost a cent more than it would to rent them for those 10 years.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is thoroughly posted on this matter, and I am not, and therefore he will excuse me for asking these questions. Now, in the letter of the Postmaster General I find this statement:

> Under the proposed plan of payment the franchises—

That is, the franchises of this tube company—> will expire in some cities before the tubes are even paid for. In one instance the property will revert to the city, and the Government will be required by the lease to pay for and operate the system after the property has reverted to the city.

What has the Senator to say about that?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator will recall that the $4,426,000 provided for is a maximum figure. The exact figure to be paid is to be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission are instructed in the report made, which is a part of this bill, to take into account the continuation of the franchises and all other similar matters; so that there can be no question about the particular instance referred to, even if there is not a renewal of the charter, which I have no doubt there would be.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator another question for information? Does this amendment contemplate that the Interstate Commerce Commission may put a higher value than this amount on it?

Mr. WEEKS. No; that is a maximum price.

Mr. NELSON. That is the maximum price? They can make it less, but they can not exceed that?

Mr. WEEKS. Exactly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CALDER. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wish to ask a question of either the Senator from New York or the Senator from Massachusetts. It is the point raised by the Senator from Minnesota which has bothered me in regard to this matter. It is a simple mathematical proposition that if we continue to pay a million dollars a year for the use of this property, we would better buy it; but are we obliged to pay a million dollars a year for the use of it? That is the question that interests me.

The committee has fixed as the maximum value of the property—and I assume that covers the subject fully—about $4,500,000. Now, 5 per cent upon that valuation, assuming that it is a correct one, would be about $225,000. That is enough for capital. It costs about $400,000—possibly a little more than that, but not much more than that—to operate and maintain the property. The two items combined will make about $650,000, and that is all that we ought to have been paying for the property year by year.

What I should like to see done would be to make a proposition to pay the owners of these properties 5 per cent upon this valuation and the cost of operation and maintenance; and then we would only be compelled to appropriate about $650,000 a year instead of a million dollars a year. Of course, if we pay $350,000 a year too much, it is easy enough to see that we ought to buy rather than to rent; but I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that the proper thing to do under those circumstances would be to compensate the owners of the tubes reasonably for the value of the property—that is, pay them a reasonable rental, say, 5 per cent upon the value of the property—and then add to that the cost of operation. Then they will be compensated, and the Government will be getting the service for the least practicable amount and will not be assuming the ownership of a property which, to say the least, is somewhat doubtful in its character.

That is the sort of a proposition that I should like to vote for. I am not at all convinced that this system ought not to be continued. In fact, I am rather inclined to think, from the report of the committee—in whose judgment I have the very highest confidence—that it is a service that ought to be continued; but why buy?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I will say that I am actuated by no purpose to deprive any of these large cities of the pneumatic-tube service; but I am utterly opposed to having this company saddle a dilapidated plant on the Government under such circumstances as are proposed in this bill.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, may I interrupt once more?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the Senator from Minnesota has been misled in regard to the character of this plant. I am pretty familiar with the pneumatic-tube service, one part of it being located in the city near which I live. I examined it all when I was chairman of the Post Office Committee of the House. I made a pretty thorough examination of it last summer, when the commission was going over this matter, and there is not anything dilapidated about the service.

The tubes, which are the main part of the cost, are in just as good condition as they were when they were put underground. There is not an evidence of damage from electrolysis, or from any other source. The containers which go through the tubes are oiled slightly, so that there is no wear on the tubes; and I have not been able to find in any place any evidence of wear, except occasionally at a turn, at a street corner; and those places are changed as soon as the wear commences to show, so that they are really brought up to date.

I am confident that if the Senator from Minnesota would make an examination he would not only find the machinery in an absolutely up-to-date condition, but he would find the tubes in as good condition, substantially speaking, as they were when they were put underground; and I have not any doubt but that the same tubes that are now being used will, except at street corners, be in operation 50 years from now and be doing as good service as they are to-day.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. Why is it, then, that the company is so anxious to sell this plant to the Government?

Mr. WEEKS. I suspect that one of the reasons, Mr. President, is that we have Postmasters General and Postmasters General, and nobody wants to own a property that may be confiscated on the whim of one individual. They would be glad to get it off their hands; and I think anybody who goes into an enterprise that is dependent solely on the Government under these conditions is taking his financial life in his hands.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the inquiries which have been made in the last few minutes, it seems to me, have covered about all I care to say in addition to what I have already stated; but, Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts, it seems to me, has covered the whole subject. These companies know that sooner or later their plants will become involved in difficulties with the Post Office Department, and therefore they make an offer to the Government to take them over. This bill provides for the appraisement of the property by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The members of that commission are men of responsibility, and I am certain that when they get through passing upon the value of this plant the Government will not be injured. I feel certain that in the long run, in view of the intimate connection of this pneumatic-tube system with the general mail facilities, the Government will be better off financially and can conduct and operate the system more efficiently itself.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. I am sorry to see the Senators from New York and Massachusetts so hopeless about obtaining a new Postmaster General. To me the future looks more bright, and I am sorry that the Senators are so despondent about this matter. [Laughter.]

Mr. CALDER. Personally, I am as optimistic as the Senator from Minnesota on the future; but that is three years off, and it seems to me frankly that after studying every phase of this situation it is real good business for the Government to take over all of this pneumatic-tube service itself.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to remark that it does not take three years to destroy a business when it is subject to the attacks that have been made upon this business; and as a result of the persistent efforts made to destroy this one, it can be destroyed in less time than three years.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President——

Mr. CALDER. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. KIRBY. I thought the Senator had about finished. I will call the Senator's attention, however, to the fact that the only information I can get—and it is from a report made by an attorney who was employed under the act of August 24, 1912—says that the franchise of the New York system is for 25 years from 1897, which will expire in 1922, or four years from now.

Mr. CALDER. My understanding is that the franchise given by the State of New York is for the perpetual operation of the tube system there. It covers the whole State of New York.

Mr. President, I repeat that the great business interests of New York are for the continuation of this pneumatic-tube system. The post office officials—and I do not refer to the present postmaster of New York, because I have not advised with him, and he has only been there a few months—but all of the men who have served there—and I speak of my intimate knowledge of the subordinate chiefs—believe that this system ought to continue. The head of the city government in New York is fearful of any further increase of the traffic in that city. I have informed the Senate of the large number of people killed last year in New York City streets and the great number of people injured, and I trust, after this subject is completely discussed, that the Senate will authorize the continuance of this service. It seems to me that after careful consideration no one can doubt the wisdom of having the Government take it over and operate it.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I desire to submit some further remarks in reference to the minority report. I have discovered in it that a report was made by an attorney employed under the act of August 24, 1912, to find out the terms under which the pneumatic-tube systems were organized and the length of life of the franchises. He reported that—

Boston, occupied all streets, revocable on order of city council.
New York, 25 years from 1897. This franchise will expire in 1922, or 4 years hence.
Chicago, 20 years from October 12, 1903, with right of purchase after October 12, 1913. This franchise expires in 1923, and under its provision the property reverts to the city of Chicago.
St. Louis, 25 years, presumably from June 10, 1903. This franchise will, therefore, expire in June, 1928.

These systems have been inaugurated; they have long been in use at an exorbitant rent paid by the Government. They have facilitated the delivery of only a certain part of mail at an exorbitant price. Our Post Office Department says we do not need it any more, "it is worthless, it is worn out and useless junk."

The Senate, as I recollect, at the last term refused to appropriate money to continue the service further, and under that condition to prevent the carrying out of that sort of policy this amendment was proposed authorizing the commission to investigate the system with a view to its purchase by the Government. The commission has reported. I am not complaining about that, but here is what I am complaining about. It is proposed to buy a system that it is said we do not want, when the franchise is revocable in Boston at the pleasure of the city council, and when no power on earth could hold and operate this system if the franchise was revoked.

Mr. WEEKS. May I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission, in fixing the price of the tubes, is instructed to take into account every question similar to the one which the Senator is now discussing, and if the price should be made measurably such on that account, undoubtedly the Interstate Commerce Commission will so report.

Mr. KIRBY. If our department in charge of the mail service says we do not want this sort of a delivery system, if the franchise for the operation of it is revocable at the pleasure of the city, and its revocation will destroy absolutely all property interests in it so far as the Government is concerned, certainly it is not to the Government's interests to purchase at any price.

In the city of New York the franchise expires in 1922. Nobody here has any other accurate information. Who says this is not correct? Here is the report of the attorney who was employed under the act of Congress to investigate and determine and report on this matter, and here is his report:

Chicago: Twenty years from October 12, 1903, with right of purchase after October 12, 1913. This franchise expires in 1923, and under its provisions the property reverts to the city of Chicago.

In 1923 when this franchise expires the entire property belongs to the city of Chicago under the franchise granted for installation.

In St. Louis the franchise expires in 1928.

That is the condition. That is the sort of system which it is proposed to unload upon the United States Government now. It does not seem to me that any sort of business judgment requires that the Government shall be compelled to buy this system, and somewhere sooner or later we must determine who has the best judgment about what will facilitate the delivery of mail in these United States, the committee of the Senate which recommends the purchase of this system of tubes or the department in charge of the Postal Service which declares it worthless and worn out. Each Senator will settle it for himself, but the condition nobody disputes is that this is the correct statement of the expiration dates of these franchises, and there are certain other burdens upon the owners:

In Boston: Persons opening surface of street must make repairs for 12 months.
New York: Streets must be restored and maintained.
Chicago: Deposit covering estimates for repair costs must be maintained.
St. Louis: Deposit covering estimates for repair costs must be maintained.
Philadelphia: Repairs must be maintained for three years.

That is the condition under which this service is operated. Those are the expiration dates of these franchises, and now it is proposed to sell them to the Government. I do not believe the proposition ought to be considered for a minute.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas has frequently alluded to the minority report. Does he mean the minority report of the commission which investigated this subject?

Mr. KIRBY. This was the minority report of the committee which Mr. A. B. ROUSE submitted.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I was about to ask the Senator. It seems that Mr. A. B. ROUSE was the entire dissenter, so far as the minority was concerned.

Mr. KIRBY. He made the minority report.

Mr. GALLINGER. The commission was unanimous in its recommendation except as to Mr. A. B. ROUSE.

Mr. KIRBY. Does the Senator question that the report as to the date of the expiration of these franchises is not correct?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am not discussing that at all.

Mr. KIRBY. I am trying to get the Senator to understand it. That is what I discussed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will not discuss anything that I do not understand. I know nothing about it, absolutely; but I have wondered several times during the debate who constituted this minority. I supposed there was a substantial division in the commission, but I have sent for the report and I have discovered that the commission was unanimous except Mr. A. B. ROUSE, whoever he may be. I do not know who he is. It is a very inconsequential minority.

Mr. BANKHEAD obtained the floor.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. BECKHAM. The Senator says he does not know who Mr. ROUSE is. Mr. ROUSE is the Representative from the sixth district of Kentucky, a very able and a very conscientious Member of that body, who has served there for many years, and who has given this subject a great deal of study and thought. He was one of the five members, I think, of the committee—or six—and he dissented from the report of the majority.

Mr. GALLINGER. I assumed that it was Mr. ROUSE, of the other House. I said I did not know who he was, because I am not acquainted with him, and I presume what the Senator from Kentucky says concerning Mr. ROUSE is absolutely correct.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I simply rose to ask the Senator from Arkansas if he has read the amendment to the bill we are now considering.

Mr. KIRBY. Yes; I have read it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then it must be that the Senator understands the whole question that he has been discussing about franchises is for the Interstate Commerce Commission to investigate. The price fixed here is simply the maximum. The Interstate Commerce Commission are instructed or requested to investigate the whole question of franchises and contracts, and all, and in fixing the price according to their view of the value of the franchises and other things considered, and doubtless they will undertake to see that the Government is protected when they come to recommend any sort of a contract with reference to the purchase of the tubes. The whole question is left to them. We simply say that they shall not pay any more than we name in the bill, and then we say they must investigate all the questions that the Senator from Arkansas was discussing—the question of the title and franchise, and everything else—and make up a verdict in accordance with their opinion as to their value. That is all there is to it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments which have been made for and on behalf of the provision that is under consideration. There are some arguments that are strongly in favor of the Government owning these tubes, if the tubes constitute the most modern device used for the transmission of mail.

Inventions that were made 20 or 25 years ago are generally subject to a great many defects and modern science has made them obsolete. If this is such an excellent device for the cities, I can not understand why the persons who operate it at a yearly expense of $350,000 to $400,000 and yet get about $900,000 a year from the Government would not want to keep it. It is an investment that, it seems to me, has paid well. In fact, as the Senator from Iowa has noted, it has paid a larger amount than should have been paid.

Mr. President, the thing that struck me as something objectionable was the fact that the tubes are only 8 inches in diameter, and consequently can not carry the mail like a larger tube could. For that reason it is said that not more than one-third of the letter mail of the United States converging at one of these cities goes through this tube. We know in every water system of a little town they start with a small water pipe, and yet as the city grows the demand becomes greater, and consequently you have got to throw away the pipe as old junk in order to substitute something that will carry the water for the city. While that illustration is not exactly parallel to this, yet if it pays to have pneumatic tubes it seems to me it would justify the Government in putting in a larger tube which would carry all the letter mail. If you do that, then, of course, you are bound to treat this as the Postmaster General has characterized it, as old junk. I am therefore forced to the conclusion that the pneumatic-tube system, constructed for a limited letter service of 20 years ago, is inadequate to the needs of a city that handles four or five times as much letter mail as it did then. It is therefore now inadequate and obsolete.

Now, who ought to determine this question? I have not any doubt of the good faith and the honesty of every member of the committee, but people will differ concerning such matters. They will see questions in a different light. Some will have an opinion one way and some another. Under those circumstances we have got to seek the truth as we see it.

Mr. President, it seems to me that when the man who is to administer this very device says he does not want it at all, that it is nothing but old junk to his department, every Senator ought to hesitate about paying $4,500,000 for something that the man who is to operate it says is worth nothing whatever to him.

That being the case, Mr. President, I can not support this provision of the bill, and I base my opposition upon the theory that there is an honest difference of opinion. When you put in the hands of a man the administration of an affair of this kind and want him to operate it, and there is no question as to his honesty, I can not help but conclude that when that man says it is worth nothing to him, that he can transmit the same quantity of mail by auto trucks, with the same speed, at one-third of the cost, his advice should be followed.

I take that into consideration, Mr. President, together with the fact that this is an old system; that it is said it is not the best system for the transportation of mails from one part of the city to another; and that the modern automobile truck, with its power to go rapidly, is one of the things that can do the work more expeditiously and more economically.

I concede that obstructing the streets may be something of a serious nature, and for that reason I can see that persons imbued with the great importance of not obstructing the streets would probably sweep away the objections which I have made. But, Mr. President, I can not attach that importance to congestion in the streets. Automobiles are used to transact the business of these cities. When the Postmaster General says that three-fourths of the mails of these cities are transported now by automobile, I can not see how we can say that that small portion of only one-third of the letter mail of the city, which is a very small proportion of the entire mail of the city, should not be transported by automobile.

Mr. President, when we consider that we have a Postmaster General—and I have absolute confidence in his ability and his integrity—and he says he does not want this service, that he does not want it as a gift from the companies that are trying to sell it, it seems to me the part of wisdom for Congress to vote against the provision providing for the purchase of these pneumatic tubes by the Government.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] on official business.

Mr. KIRBY. I announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] on official business. I also wish to announce that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] is necessarily detained on official business.

Mr. WILLIAMS (after having voted in the negative). I forgot my pair. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and let my vote stand.

Mr. CALDER (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], but on this question I am at liberty to vote. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. BECKHAM. I announce that my colleague [Mr. JAMES] is detained by illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK];

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, under date of April 11 a communication, over the signature of the Postmaster General, was addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and a copy of the same was mailed to each Senator. That communication had to do with the provision of the Post Office appropriation bill dealing with the compensation of post-office employees. I propose, Mr. President, to make some comments on this letter, and rather than occupy the time of the Senate in reading it I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Would not the Senator from New York let us get through with the formal parts of the bill which are undisposed of? We are coming to the question the Senator desires to discuss; that is the next disputed question, and the Senator might rather speak on that when it is before the Senate.

Mr. CALDER. I am willing to comply with the request of the Senator from Georgia, if that is his wish.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope the Senator will let us go on and finish the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. We shall come to the question the Senator desires to discuss pretty soon, and I am sure the Senator had rather speak on it when it is before the Senate.

Mr. CALDER. I yield for that purpose. I withdraw the letter for the present and shall later present it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I now desire that the amendment reported by the committee on page 30, section 18, be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment referred to by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads propose to insert, on page 30, after line 9, a new section, to be known as section 8, as follows:

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, deliver and turn over to the Postmaster General from time to time, and without charge therefor, for use in the Postal Service, such aeroplanes and automobiles or parts thereof as may prove to be, or as shall become, unsuitable for the purposes of the War Department; and the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to use the same, in his discretion, in the transportation of the mails and to pay the necessary expenses thereof out of the appropriation for inland transportation by steamboat or other power boat or by aeroplanes or star route.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 20, to insert:

SEC. 9. Employees of the Postal Service who have entered the military or naval service of the United States or who shall hereafter enter it during the existence of the present war shall, when honorably discharged from such service, be reassigned to their duties in the Postal Service at the salary to which they would have been automatically promoted had they remained in the Postal Service, provided they are physically and mentally qualified to perform the duties of such positions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, my attention has been called to this section, and I was inquired of as to whether or not it applies to substitute employees as well as to regular employees.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I apprehend that it will so apply, because it says "employees of the Postal Service."

Mr. GALLINGER. I so replied, that I thought it would of necessity apply to substitute employees as well as to regular employees. I am glad that the Senator in charge of the bill agrees to that construction of the language.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I think the only question would be as to whether or not the substitute employees were actually in the service when they went to war. If they were, I think this covers that case. Such substitute employees ought to be covered, I am sure.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama can give a little thought to that, and when the matter gets to conference, as it undoubtedly will, it may be corrected if it is not now specific.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall have no objection in the world to having inserted any language which may be suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I suggest that the language read "employees, including substitute employees."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment which is proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "employees," on line 21, page 30, it is proposed to insert "including substitute employees."

Mr. GALLINGER. That makes it clear.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 10. That the act approved January 21, 1918 (38 Stats., p. 278), authorizing the Postmaster General to adjust certain claims of postmasters for loss by burglary, fire, or other unavoidable casualty, be so amended as to include United States war savings certificates, United States Government thrift stamps, war-tax revenue stamps, and funds received from the sale of such stamps: Provided, That this act shall not embrace any claim for losses as aforesaid which accrued prior to September 24, 1917, and all such claims must be presented within six months from the time the loss occurred.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In section 10, page 31, line 6, I move to strike out "18" and to insert "14." It is merely a misprint.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 10, page 31, line 6, it is proposed to strike out "18" and to insert "14," so as to read "1914."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was, on page 31, after line 17, to insert:

SEC. 11. The provision of the act of June 3, 1916, an act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense and for other purposes, and the act of August 29, 1916, an act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes, authorizing the payment of $5 to postmasters at second, third, and fourth class offices for each recruit secured by them and accepted by the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I desire to offer an amendment on page 32, after line 3. I move at that point to insert two new sections, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first section proposed as an amendment to the bill by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 32, after line 3, it is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 12. That hereafter the balance to the credit of any one person in a postal savings depository, exclusive of accumulated interest, shall not exceed $2,000. Noninterest-paying deposits shall not be accepted. All laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next section proposed as an amendment to the bill by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just agreed to, it is proposed to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 13. That section 6 of the act approved June 25, 1910, is hereby further amended so that the proviso in said section shall read as follows: "Provided, That in order that smaller amounts may be accumulated for deposit, any person may purchase for 10 cents, from any postal savings depository, specially prepared adhesive stamps, to be known as 'postal savings stamps,' and attach them to a card which shall be furnished for the purpose. A card with 10 postal savings stamps affixed shall be accepted as a deposit of $1, either in opening an account or in adding to an existing account, or may be redeemed in cash."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment, proposed by the Senator from Alabama, will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 32, line 4, it is proposed to change the number of section "12" to "14."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment on page 20, in lines 9 and 22.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 20, line 9, it is proposed to strike out the numerals "$545,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$555,000"; and in line 22 to strike out the numerals "$15,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, on page 21 there was an amendment which was passed over at the request of some Senator—I have forgotten by whom now—and I should like the Secretary to state the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment referred to by the Senator from Alabama.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, the amendment proposed by Mr. BANKHEAD is, after the word "service," in line 4, to strike out the period and to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided further, That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby empowered and directed, as soon as practicable, to fix and determine from time to time the fair and reasonable rates and compensation for the transportation of mail matter by urban and interurban electric railway common carriers and the service connected therewith, prescribing the method or methods by weight or space, or both, or otherwise, for ascertaining such rate or compensation and to publish the same, and orders so made and published shall continue in force until changed by the commission after due notice and hearing: Provided further, That it shall be unlawful for any urban or interurban electric railroad to refuse to perform mail service at the rates or methods of compensation provided for such service when required by the Postmaster General so to do, and for such offense shall be fined $100. Each day of refusal shall constitute a separate offense.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. When we were considering the bill the other day we passed over section 3, and I think we might refer to and dispose of that now.

Mr. SMOOT. On what page is that section?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is on page 28.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment referred to will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 28, in the committee amendment, after the word "offices," in line 12, it was proposed by Mr. BANKHEAD to insert "and railway postal clerks assigned to terminal railway post offices and transfer offices," so that if amended the section will read as follows:

That hereafter watchmen, messengers, and laborers in first and second class post offices and railway postal clerks assigned to terminal railway post offices and transfer offices shall be required to work not more than eight hours a day—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be agreed to, without objection.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before that amendment is agreed to I desire to inquire if that is the amendment offered by the committee? My attention was diverted in another direction for a moment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is a committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it the amendment which provides that "when the needs of the Postal Service require the employment on Sundays and holidays of railway postal clerks assigned to terminal railway post offices and transfer offices they shall be granted compensatory time in the same manner as provided by law for clerks and carriers in first and second class offices"?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, I should like to know of the Senator having the bill in charge why assistant postmasters and other supervisory employees are not included in the provision?

Mr. BANKHEAD. They are provided for in another section.

Mr. SMOOT. That being so, I have no objection to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Mr. BANKHEAD offered another amendment, to add at the end of section 3 the following proviso:

Provided, That hereafter when the needs of the Postal Service require the employment on Sundays and holidays of railway postal clerks assigned to terminal railway post offices and transfer offices they shall be granted compensatory time in the same manner as provided by law for clerks and carriers in first and second class offices.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if he will not accept an amendment to that amendment by inserting after the word "of," in line 4, of his amendment, the words "assistant postmasters and other supervisory employees, and."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment as modified is agreed to, and the amendment as amended is agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I now ask to recur to section 4.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, page 28, line 23, Mr. BANKHEAD proposes the following amendment: After the word "envelopes" insert a comma and the words "blanks and blank books, and the Official Postal Guide."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the Senate will not adopt the amendment, and I desire to occupy a short time to explain why it should not be adopted. I wish the Senators present would give me their attention, because, while the amendment on its face may look simple, it is far-reaching in character.

Mr. President, on February 6, 1917, the same question was before the Senate, and, after an explanation of the matter, it was not agreed to by the Senate. The then Senator from New Jersey, Mr. Martine, a member of the Post Office Committee, called up a bill on this subject and asked for its consideration. I did not object to its consideration, but I wanted to make an explanation of it before the Senate voted upon it. Among other things said at that time was this:

Mr. SMOOT. I know all about the bill. I want to say to the Senator that, outside of the postal-card paper purchased by the Post Office Department, the balance of the paper furnished the Government Printing Office and for the printing of everything for the Government is under the supervision of the Joint Committee on Printing. Every contractor has made the same request of that committee—to be relieved of the contracts that they held with the Government. To show the Senator what this means——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have no objection to the bill going over.

Mr. SMOOT. I take it for granted that Congress would not have one contractor relieved unless all were relieved. In this connection, I might say that the Attorney General has held that not only will the contractors be compelled to supply the amount of paper provided for in the award but they will have to furnish all that the Government Printing Office may require until March 1 of this year.

Mr. President, contracts have been made for the printing of the Official Postal Guide for the term of four years, and I think that one or two of those four years have already expired. This whole section ought to be defeated, for, I assure the Senate now, if it becomes a law, as applying to contractors furnishing envelopes, blanks, blank books, and the Official Postal Guide, there is not a contractor furnishing paper to the Government of the United States who will not demand, for the same reasons that are given for this legislation, that the contracts entered into by him be modified.

The contractors will have a perfect right to make that demand, provided the Congress of the United States modifies the contracts of those furnishing envelopes, blank books, and the Official Postal Guide. I can not say how much will be involved in dollars and cents to the Government, but I will say that it will involve hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. On what reason is the request for a modification based?

Mr. SMOOT. The only reason is that the price of paper and the price of labor have advanced, and therefore the contracts ought to be annulled and new contracts entered into.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to say to the Senator that we had before the Commerce Committee proposals from contractors asking for relief in connection with their contracts for river and harbor improvements and to have their contracts, extending into the millions of dollars, modified for the same alleged reason.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right. In one or two cases contractors for paper have forfeited the bonds which they have given to insure the carrying out of their contracts. It is true that they made money by forfeiting the bond, which was only $5,000, but I notified those contractors that, so far as I was concerned, no further contracts should ever be given them by the Government of the United States, if I could prevent it, and I mean to carry that out if it is in my power to do so.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SMOOT. I will.

Mr. NELSON. There is in the river and harbor bill an amendment along the same line with reference to the river and harbor improvements, wherein it is proposed to give the Secretary of War the right to readjust contracts, but we have expressly limited it to future cases, and the provision is not to have any retroactive effect. As the language in this section under consideration is worded it will apply to contracts made last year as well as in the years to come. I think it should be amended so as to cover only cases in the future.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that any contract that is now entered into by a manufacturer in the United States will be at such prices that I do not think there will be any necessity for its modification in the future, nor do I think there is any necessity for it now. I will admit that in some cases—and I will admit this is true so far as the Postal Guide is concerned—paper has increased slightly since the contract was entered into, but not so very much, and I know that labor has increased since the contract was entered into, but that is the case with nearly every contract which is now in existence.

The contracts covered by this provision are made for four years. When I was appealed to by one of the representatives of the concern printing the Official Guide, I explained to him the position in which it would place the Government of the United States if a particular case should be provided for, and I called his attention to the fact that it meant that all contractors would feel that they were entitled to the same consideration if Congress granted it as to that one concern. I am quite sure, Mr. President, that nobody offhand can estimate the amount it will cost the Government if this section shall be agreed to and becomes a law.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I think one contractor, through his attorney perhaps, spoke to me about a contract which he had for envelopes; and his position, as I understood, was simply that he desired only to be made whole on his contract. But the Senator's objection to all legislation of this kind recalls to my mind another case relating to a contractor on one of the public buildings. The contractor whom I have in mind came to see me the other day. He has constructed quite a number of post offices and other public buildings for the Government. He has done all this work on a very narrow margin; at least, I think I know enough about the man to believe that to be so, and he is a man of very modest means. He took a contract in West Virginia on a very narrow margin, as he believed. He is now at a point where he can not even meet his pay roll, he says, because of the increased cost of material and the increased cost of labor. That building must be completed either by him or by his bondsmen. It is going to leave him absolutely bankrupt. I know that that man would not want anything save and except enough to make him whole. If this were under normal times I would say there was not any merit whatever in his claim; but when we are in the midst of this great war and everything has gone skyward, so far as prices are concerned, I hardly believe that it would be just for this Government to say to him, "You are bound by the letter of your contract, notwithstanding the fact that you were not responsible for bringing on this war."

It seems to me that there are some of these cases that have a good deal of equity in them, and I do not believe this Government wants to have that building put up and completed by this man and thereby reduce him to bankruptcy, because of the fact that the Nation happens to be at war. That kind of a case appeals to me a good deal, and yet I realize that there is a good deal of force in what the Senator says so far as some of these contractors are concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the prices of material and labor had decreased, there is not a contractor in the United States who would have come to the Government of the United States and said: "Labor has decreased; material of all kinds has decreased; everything has decreased since I entered into the contract, and upon my contract through those decreases I have been able to earn more than I anticipated, and I will give the increase to the Government of the United States." There is no such case as that in all the history of the country. If we are going into this question, let us not stop here and say that the Postmaster General shall have the right to make these investigations. Let it be a general law and apply to all the contracts of the Government, and let us know just where it is going to lead us to; and if we are willing to pay the cost, let it apply to every contractor doing business with the Government of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think there is something to be said on both sides of this question. The illustration the Senator from Ohio has given appeals to me very strongly. Now, let us carry out the suggestion of the Senator from Utah, that if prices had decreased these men would not have paid over their profits to the Government. We might apply that to ourselves. If prices had decreased and we had been getting our $5,000 a year, we would not have paid back any portion of it to the Government. We would have taken it ourselves. Prices increased, however, and we increased our salaries.

I think the men who have taken these contracts, especially if they are men of moderate means, when prices have increased so enormously without any fault of theirs, ought to have some consideration. I do not know how far we ought to go, but it ought to be a pretty general rule to apply to everybody.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, Mr. President, prices have increased since the Members of Congress increased their salaries from $5,000 to $7,500.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but the plea was that we could not live on our salaries, and so we reached out and got some more, very properly, as I think.

Mr. SMOOT. But what I meant to say was that there has been no increase in a Congressman's salary since the recent rapid increase in the cost of living began.

Mr. GALLINGER. The principle is the same.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow an interruption?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am inclined to agree with the Senator in his position that we ought to have a general law that would apply to all contracts with the Government.

I have been looking into that question to some extent and trying to develop a plan whereby a statute may be passed which will give the Court of Claims jurisdiction to consider all inequities which have arisen by reason of war conditions, and allow people who have contracts with the Government to go into that court and make claim for the enormous increase in the cost of labor and material by way of adjusting the equities. I do not know whether that could be done or not, but that would be a better way of reaching it, I suspect. That, however, would be the long way of reaching it.

I am not on this committee, and therefore I can not speak from any direct information on the subject; but I have not any doubt that there are a number of contractors—star-route contractors, screen-wagon contractors, and men of that sort—who are in a position where they are absolutely ruined by the enormous increase in the cost of operating under their contracts, the cost of labor, the cost of materials, and supplies of all sorts. Some of them will be unable to go on. Now, the question is whether you will authorize the Postmaster General to adjust these contracts so that they will be able to carry on their work or whether you will allow them to go broke and quit, sue their bondsmen, and possibly require the Government to make other contracts.

The Senator will remember that in our Joint Committee on Printing, where we have refused to accept bids for paper because they were so high, we have found that by going out and purchasing in the open market we have saved the Government several thousand dollars this year. That is to say, every man who wants to make a contract with the Government now puts up the price, so as to be safe; and if we call for new bids for the work of all these contractors we are going to find that they will be very high, and the Government will be put to an enormous expense. The question is, Would it not be better to allow the Postmaster General to adjust this matter with the contractor, so as to meet these extraordinary conditions in a fair and just way?

The amendment is a little loosely drawn, because it uses the word "necessity." It says, "where the facts disclose the necessity for such adjustment." It is left entirely with the Postmaster General to determine whether or not the necessity exists. It is not obligatory on him to revise any contract or adjust it; but, wherever the necessity seems to exist, he is authorized to do it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that this legislation would not be before the Senate unless it had been already decided that there was a necessity existing.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think likely that is true.

Mr. SMOOT. And in a report that was made to the House and to the Senate in February, 1917, the Postmaster General then said that there were some 30 cases involved.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no doubt that that is true; but the Senator knows, of course, that the price of paper has increased enormously.

Mr. SMOOT. Not since this contract was made. This contract is a little over a year old, and the price of news-print paper a year ago, or even in the latter part of 1916, when sulphides were so very scarce in the United States, was just as high as the price of paper to-day. I refer now to the print paper. The bond papers, as the Senator well knows, have increased in price rapidly, and the writing papers have increased in price, but not the paper upon which the Official Guide is printed.

Mr. FLETCHER. What about the envelopes?

Mr. SMOOT. The cost of envelopes have increased, and if the Senator has followed the appropriation bills that we have passed at this session of Congress, he knows that the Postmaster General has been given as high as $500,000 additional for the purpose of meeting the increased cost of envelopes, and it seems to me that manufacturers will be taken care of pretty generally. I will admit that the company printing the Guide is compelled, perhaps, to pay a higher wage this year than they were when they took the contract, but as far as the price of paper is concerned there is not so very much difference, as the Senator well knows.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when this question was before the House of Representatives in February, 1917, and this same authority was asked for, it was limited there so that in no case could the contract price be increased more than from 25 to 50 per cent. There is no limit in the pending amendment. The Postmaster General can increase it 100 per cent, or 200 per cent, or any other per cent that he may desire.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, has not the Postmaster General complete discretion now with regard to making new contracts?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then, if we can trust him entirely in fixing the prices in new contracts, surely we can trust him to revise them.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the way new contracts are made is this: Bids are asked for, and if the company making the lowest bid can give a sufficient bond, it is always entitled to the contract. In this case, however, there is no bidder; and under this provision whatever the Postmaster General thinks the contractor ought to be paid, he is authorized to pay him.

It is a very, very loose provision, Mr. President; and it does seem to me that it would be very much better that it should go out of this bill, and then that we should pass general legislation, so that any contractor of the Government who finds himself in exactly the same position in which the contractor referred to by the Senator from Ohio finds himself can appeal to the head of the department that made the contract with him, and he can have power to modify it. Let us have no half-way business about it. Let us do it in the proper way, the same as a business concern would do it.

When this matter was before the House, Mr. Fitzgerald made this statement, in answer to Mr. MOON:

> If this policy be adopted regarding this post-office contract, what excuse will we have for not adopting the same policy with respect to the shipbuilders and the armor-plate manufacturers and the people supplying rations for the Army and the Navy, and, in fact, every contract made by the Government, whether there has been an increase in the cost of material, and the contractor can make a profit out of it, or not?

I do not want to take the time of the Senate to go into the discussion in the House, but the Senate refused to act upon it and the House refused to act upon it at that time, and there is not very much difference between the conditions existing now with our contractors and the conditions existing at that time. It is true that in some cases the old contracts have run out and new contracts have been made, and those contracts have been made knowing the situation both as to the labor and as to the material market of the United States. Taking paper as a basis, I want to say to you that I think not only has the Government of the United States paid the advance of the wage and the advance of the material, but it has paid a good round percentage with a view that prices may still further advance.

Therefore, Mr. President, I believe the wise thing to do would be to disagree to section 4, and let us take up the question as a separate proposition, and go just as far as Congress wants to go in modifying the contracts; but let us have a limit. If 25 per cent is enough, let it be 25 per cent. If Congress thinks it necessary to have a margin of 50 per cent, let it be 50 per cent, but let us have a limit, so that we will know what we have got to meet, at least.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator just one question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to ask whether or not any of these contracts were made prior to our entering into the war—prior to April, 1917? It seems to me that contracts made after that time would be made under war conditions, and there would be no occasion for adjusting them.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to answer the Senator from Florida for a moment, and then I will yield to the Senator. I have not the exact date when the Postal Guide contract was made, but I think it was made before we entered the war. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] nods his head in acknowledgment that that is true. It was made some time before we entered the war; but, of course, the war conditions existed in this country long before we entered the war.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know; but they changed considerably and became more acute afterwards. I think there are such circumstances in a good many cases that there ought to be some authority granted to consider them and act accordingly. I do not know any better way of doing it than to leave it to the head of the department to adjust it, unless we have some court established to do it; and, of course, that would be a long process.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that when the matter was up before, the House took the position that it ought to be general legislation rather than special legislation, such as this amendment provides. I think myself that the question is worthy of the deepest consideration, and that whatever we do we ought to have general rather than special legislation, such as is provided for here.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to suggest two amendments here to perfect this section and make it in harmony with an amendment we have prepared to the river and harbor bill.

After the word "service" in line 22, page 28, I move to insert the words "entered into prior to the existing war," so that it will read:

> That the Postmaster General is authorized to investigate conditions arising from contracts in the star-route, screen-wagon, and other vehicle service entered into prior to the existing war.

I have another amendment, later on, which will perfect the section still further.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator uses the language "prior to the existing war." It seems to me that that is rather ambiguous. Would it not be best to fix a date, and say "prior to April, 1917," for example?

Mr. NELSON. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. "Prior to April 6, 1917."

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; "prior to April 6, 1917," because "prior to the existing war" might mean prior to August, 1914.

Mr. NELSON. Then I move to amend by inserting after the word "service" the words "prior to the 6th day of April, 1917."

Then, the second amendment to perfect the section is to insert the following words after the word "same," in line 1, on page 29:

For materials or services hereafter to be furnished or rendered.

So that it could apply only to services rendered after the passage of this act, or to materials furnished after the passage of this act. I am informed that the chairman of the committee will consent to that amendment.

Mr. HARDWICK. I think that is all right.

Mr. NELSON. Those two amendments perfect the section.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that amendment certainly ought to be adopted as suggested now by the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let us have a vote first on the amendments to the amendment. The committee has no objection to that amendment, I am informed. Let us adopt it, and then I want to submit some observations on the amendment as amended.

Mr. NELSON. I offer those amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 28, line 22, in the committee amendment, after the word "service," it is proposed to insert the words "entered into prior to April 6, 1917."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. And on page 29, line 1, is the committee amendment, after the word "same," it is proposed to insert "for materials or services hereafter to be furnished or rendered."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Alabama proposed, on page 28, in the committee amendment, on line 23, after the word "envelopes," to insert "blanks and blank books, and the Official Postal Guide."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I do not want to detain the Senate, but this amendment was adopted at the suggestion of the Post Office Department, on representations made by the purchasing agent, who contended that it was necessary in the interest of the Government itself, because he said that the departments had so expanded their activities that in many cases it was necessary to buy a great deal more supplies than had ever been estimated for, and that to carry out their contracts would not only break many of these contractors and exhaust their bonds, but, after all that was done, would still leave a tremendous amount of supplies for the Government to purchase; and he insisted that if this authority were given to the Postmaster General he could make adjustments in equitable cases where the interest of the Government itself required it as well as the equities of the individual contractor. It seems to me that there is something in that view of the matter if the Post Office Department is right about it.

For instance, take what he says about envelopes. Mr. Edgerton said this:

The contracts were made about the second—no; the first—year of the war, I think in 1915, when paper was very low. Paper has since advanced in some cases 100 per cent. Labor has advanced, I should say offhand, 50 to 60 per cent—that is, wages. Other materials have advanced in like degree. Because of the war, the orders on some of these sizes of envelopes have increased very greatly. I think the estimates on a number of items have already been exceeded 50 per cent and in some cases 100 per cent on the amounts ordered. At the time these contracts were made we had an estimate from each department of the Government—

Now, these envelopes were furnished to every one of the nine executive departments, as well as to the commissions—as to the probable requirements of that department on this particular item.

He said, down here in another place——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator remembers, we have already increased the appropriation in this bill for the payment for envelopes and for stationery.

Mr. HARDWICK. Undoubtedly; but that is for the fiscal year covered by the bill. The trouble is——

Mr. SMOOT. What I mean to say is that if we have contracts, as referred to in that statement, lasting until 1919, that price would not have advanced at all. I do think, however, that there are a lot of envelopes purchased in the open market. They have no contract, and no doubt they are paying more for the envelopes than they did in 1915.

Mr. HARDWICK. That is the point exactly; and his point is that if you break these contractors in some of these cases, and exhaust their bonds, even after that is done the Government will lose money on the transaction, because it will have to go out into the market and purchase under existing conditions.

Mr. SMOOT. I will assure the Senator that that will not happen with the Official Guide.

Mr. HARDWICK. It may not. I am referring to the envelope situation particularly, now.

Mr. SMOOT. Nor do I think it will happen with the blanks or blank books, but it may with the envelopes.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Edgerton was asked this question in the committee:

Senator SWANSON. The suggestion you would make for relief would be to give the Postmaster General authority to administer equity and justice in these cases?

Mr. EDGERTON. Yes, sir.

Senator SWANSON. Give him discretion to settle with them on a fair and reasonable basis?

Mr. EDGERTON. To extend temporary relief without giving them a profit; but simply make it possible for them to live. I think that would be good business on the part of the department and on the part of the Government.

Senator HARDWICK. In other words, you think it would be a good idea to permit the Postmaster General temporarily to make such modifications in the contract price as he thinks necessary?

Mr. EDGERTON. As he thinks necessary for the interests of the Government.

I can conceive of situations where that might very well be true. We have not given the Postmaster General any power that I think he is likely to abuse about that matter. We all know that he is trying to pile up a surplus all the time in the department; and he is not likely to give these people anything to which they are not entitled, or that the interests of the Government do not require him to give them. In cases where a contractor is in such a position that you will break him, and his bond is inadequate to protect the Government against the unprecedented expansion of governmental activities, the Government will lose by that procedure. It will have to go out in the open market and buy the material, and pay a much higher price.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. As section 4 is amended now, it applies to all those contracts that were entered into prior to the declaration of war.

Mr. HARDWICK. I thought the Senator's amendment was an improvement, and advised its acceptance.

Mr. NELSON. The envelopes were already covered in the bill?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. But the other applied to the star-route service and the vehicle service?

Mr. HARDWICK. That is true enough.

Mr. NELSON. So that it all relates to the same contracts?

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. And it is exactly in harmony with a similar amendment that we prepared for the river and harbor bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. Yes. I thought the Senator's amendment was right, and I am glad the Senate has adopted it. Now, I think in this modified form we ought to adopt the provision, and I will tell you why I think so:

It is all right to talk about general legislation about these things, but what is everybody's business is nobody's business; and the place where the pressure comes is from the department that handle these particular and specific things in each case. Some Representative to whom the Senator referred spoke of general legislation that was to be enacted, but we have not yet seen the general legislation, even to this good hour. It seems to me that the necessary thing to do is to attend to those things in the proper manner in each one of the departments as we come to them. That is what we tried to do in this case.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the same language ought to be used in both cases. The amendment of the Senator from Minnesota had reference to bids that were received prior to the 6th day of April, 1917.

Mr. HARDWICK. The language used by the committee was, "prior to the declaration of the present war," which is the same thing.

Mr. SMOOT. I simply thought the same language ought to be used in both cases——

Mr. HARDWICK. Oh, yes; I am perfectly willing for that to be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Although I do not particularly care which way it is.

Mr. HARDWICK. It does not matter.

I hope we will have a vote, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], as amended, to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, there is an amendment passed over at the instance of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], as follows——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has been called from the Chamber upon official business. I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill how long he is going to run to-night? It is now 5 o'clock.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, we are getting along so well that I do not see why we can not finish this evening.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not think he can finish the bill this evening, does he? The question of the increase of salaries will come up.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not suppose there will be any objection to that.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure it is going to lead to some discussion. I do not know of anything else in the bill that will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Are there any other amendments which have been passed over aside from the one the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] asked should be passed over?

Mr. SMOOT. There is one of a similar kind. There are two, but they are exactly the same. The Senator from Washington will be here to-morrow morning.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What other amendments have been passed over, other than the one referred to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Section 2.

Mr. NELSON. Has section 2 been disposed of?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the proposed increase for postal employees. That is pending.

Mr. SMOOT. And it will take some time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That was passed over. My purpose is to ask if there is any other minor matter that we might dispose of to-day.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not one marked.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is difficult for the Chair to find out what a minor matter is.

The SECRETARY. The amendment was passed over, on page 27, beginning at line 4. The total, "$53,000,000," the committee proposes to strike out and insert "$62,875,000."

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is involved in the amendment to increase the pay.

Mr. CALDER. I have an amendment to offer.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I propose a substitute amendment for section 2, in order that it may be printed, so that Members of the Senate can have copies of it to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I move that the Senate proceed to consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 15, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 14, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, whose mercy is from everlasting to everlasting, we come to Thee in this hour of distress for consolation, strength, and renewed hope; but we thank Thee that if the terrible war in which the world has been plunged must needs have come, it has brought the lovers of liberty, peace, and justice into the closer bonds of brotherhood through a deep and fervent patriotism to defend the rights Thou hast taught us to hold sacred; that religion is finding its place in the hearts of men; the nonessentials are being eliminated, the essentials are in the ascendancy; that the blessed faith in the immortality of the soul is the consolation and inspiration of the men who are called upon to face death on the field of battle; and that those who are giving their loved ones a sacrifice on the altar of liberty are finding sweet consolation and comfort that love will at last find its own and the heart be satisfied in Thine own good time.

Hear and answer our prayer in the name of the thorn-crowned King, the glory-crowned King, whose name is Immanuel. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LEVER, for five days, on account of important business; and

To Mr. CARTER of Massachusetts, for two weeks, on account of illness.

THE WAR.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. On what subject?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. On the war.

Mr. GILLETT. I do not object if your side does not.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I received the following letter.

[George J. Leftwich. C. L. Tubb. Leftwich & Tubb, attorneys and counselors at law, Monroe Banking and Trust Building.]

ABERDEEN, MISS., May 11, 1918.

Hon. E. S. CANDLER,
Office 102, House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CANDLER: Herewith please find a list of the members of the "First Mississippi Confederate Company," which company, as you will observe, is made up of old Confederate veterans of Monroe County, Miss. They are the men who in days gone by wore the gray, but now they want to don the khaki.

[Applause.]

They are offering themselves to the President, to be used in any capacity in which he may direct, for the purpose of winning this war.

[Applause.]

These men met here at Aberdeen, Miss., on May 3, and by unanimous vote tendered their services to our great Commander in Chief, Woodrow Wilson. Capt. J. W. Howard is the captain of the company, and he brought the list to me yesterday with the request that I send it to you, as our Representative, with request that you place it before the President and the War Department in proper form. Please do this at once, and greatly oblige,

Very sincerely, yours, C. L. TUBB.

The dispatch in the newspapers giving an account of this meeting reads as follows:

STILL FULL OF FIGHT—MONROE CONFEDERATE VETERANS OFFER THEIR SERVICES TO PRESIDENT.

ABERDEEN, MISS., May 9.

At a meeting of the Confederate veterans of Monroe County it was resolved that they offer their services to President Wilson and the United States Government and ask him to use them in any way that he saw fit in order that they might help win the war.

[Applause.]

The following is a list of the members of "The First Mississippi Confederate Company," which met at Aberdeen, Miss., May 3, 1918, and voted unanimously to offer their services to the President, to be used as he may direct in the present war:

J. W. Howard, captain; J. M. Fears, first lieutenant; J. M. McDuffie, second lieutenant; N. H. Pratt, first sergeant; D. A. Beeks, color bearer; F. C. Ross, quartermaster; Dr. W. G. Sykes, surgeon; Baxter McFarland, judge advocate. Privates: J. M. Addington, William Allen, A. Armstrong, J. Adams, Ben Bradford, J. G. Ball, W. P. Bradley, Henry Ballard, A. J. Brown, John Beckham, Jim M. Buchanan, John Barrett, John Buchanan, Sam Beckham, Joe Buford, Austin Chism, J. M. Cunningham, Madison Cunningham, H. Cox, D. Cox, C. R. Cheek, B. Darracott, W. T. Dawkins, L. Donelson, N. C. Dalton, W. L. Dottery, J. S. Dugger, N. W. Dickerson, A. J. Easter, Dr. J. W. Eckford, Giles Fuqua, James Fuqua, J. A. Grady, W. W. Grady, Frank Gilleylen, Lundys Gunn, Will Howell, Sam Howell, John Henley, S. G. Henley, Needham Hatch, Jim Howell, Buck Howell, William Holliday, Ben Holland, John Hood, William Kendrick, W. M. Morgan, S. G. Morgan, Will Morgan, John Meek, Frank Matthews, Fred Matthews, William Noah, T. G. Owen, J. N. Pate, W. B. Prewitt, Halen Ritter, W. T. Roberts, John Roberts, J. M. Smith, P. Sommerford, Dan Sandifer, Doc Sartor, J. O. L. Smith, George Tindall, W. L. Tubb, Jesse Tate, William Vandiver, Baker Word, Charley Word, John Wamble, J. O. Woods, John Woods, W. B. West.

As I have now read these names I feel proud myself, because I am honored in having these Confederate veterans, God bless them, as my constituents. I know them personally and know each of them to be as brave men, as good citizens, and as patriotic Americans as live in the world, and I feel sure if the President will accept the services which they have tendered and turn them loose they will exemplify the spirit, the daring, and the bravery which they demonstrated on many a battle field in days gone by, and "go over the top" and do their full part to annihilate Germany and destroy the Kaiser. [Loud applause.]

When I look at our surroundings as they are to-day, when the boys from the North and the boys from the South, the East, and the West are all gathering together to bring about the great victory which is ahead of us; when I see our beloved President, Woodrow Wilson; our honored Vice President, THOMAS R. MARSHALL; our great Speaker, CHAMP CLARK; our splendid leader on the Democratic side, CLAUDE KITCHIN; and our genial leader on the Republican side, FREDERICK H. GILLETT, standing shoulder to shoulder and heart to heart, backed up by all the membership of this House, pressing forward in one solid phalanx to aid in every possible way to secure decisive victory so greatly desired, I feel and I know that triumphant victory is coming and that it will be ours. [Applause.]

I know we are all happy to-day in the thought that we have no divided country, but that we are all standing together, united as one man for the advancement of one common cause in the interest of liberty and humanity. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I request unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object, although the gentleman is making a mighty good speech. [Cries of many Members, "Let him go on!" "Give him the time!" "We want to hear him!"] I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I am glad the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] withdraws his objection, as it is apparent everybody wants to hear me. [Applause.] I was surprised when the gentleman interposed his objection, and am gratified that there were so many protests against it.

Mr. BURNETT. I note protests from the gallery.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Protests even from the gallery. As I was saying when interrupted, I am glad to see the encouraging conditions existing all over the country, which makes all our hearts glad, because there are no longer any divisions among us, which is being demonstrated by a united effort of all our leaders and the patriotic services of our soldier boys. When I see the patriotic service in this House of that "grand old man" from the North, Gen. ISAAC R. SHERWOOD, of Ohio [applause]; and Hon. HENRY ZENAS OSBORNE, of California, who wore the "blue"; and of that "grand old man" from the South, Maj. CHARLES MANLY STEDMAN, of North Carolina [applause]; and Hon. ALBERT ESTOPINAL, of Louisiana and Hon. J. FRED. C. TALBOTT, of Maryland, who wore the "gray," I know there is no longer any division in these awful times in the House, there is no politics, no partisanship, but Americanism and patriotism is predominant and we are all standing together for the accomplishment of the one great purpose of our cause, and that is justice to all, which can only be secured by victory. In our common purpose there is no division; we stand together, citizens and patriots, in an indissoluble union of indestructible States, all beneath the folds of our flag—the Stars and Stripes—the emblem of liberty and our country's glory. [Applause.] It is our flag, and it will continue to wave; and may God grant that when our boys take it and "go over the top" they may be spared to bring it back to us as the personification of that liberty which we all love and which has been exemplified throughout the history of this Republic. [Great applause.]

No national defeat has ever come to it and never will come to it, but it will continue to wave throughout the years which are to come and receive the plaudits of all the nations of the world, because it is the flag that everywhere and on all occasions has stood for justice, democracy, righteousness, and truth. For this flag the old Confederate soldiers, the old Union soldiers, you and I, are willing to fight, and, if necessary, are willing to die. [Applause.] Side by side for our flag and for what it represents the boys of the South and the boys of the North, the boys of the rich and the boys of the poor, all alike, are standing together. He who does not stand with them heart and soul is a traitor to his country, an enemy to society, and unworthy of the liberty guaranteed in this free country, and deserves to be stood up before a firing squad. [Applause.] The sons of the North and the sons of the South appeal to a glorious country for support and encouragement. I know nobody here will turn a deaf ear to their appeal, and no patriotic citizen anywhere will do so. If the immortal Robert E. Lee [applause] and the indomitable Ulysses S. Grant [applause] were living and young enough to fight they would be fighting side by side for the preservation of this Republic, its liberties, and its blessings, all of which are now at stake. Is there a man subject to duty in all this country—North, South, East, or West—who would not follow in their footsteps and in accord with the strains of martial music march to victory and to glory repeating these beautiful lines:

Here's to the Blue of the wind-swept North,
When we meet on the fields of France;
May the spirit of Grant be with you all
As the sons of the North advance.

And here's to the Gray of the sun-kissed South,
When we meet on the fields of France;
May the spirit of Lee be with you all
As the sons of the South advance.

And here's to the Blue and Gray as one,
When we meet on the fields of France;
May the spirit of God be with us all
As the sons of the Flag advance.

No; not one, I am sure; but with the hearts of all uttering those sentiments all would say with one great acclaim, "Here's to America, the land of the free, the home of the brave; the land that stands for the right, for God, and humanity—in thy name give us victory." [Great applause.]

THE SPEAKER.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know on what subject the gentleman desires to speak.

Mr. BARNHART. It is a subject which the gentleman will approve, I am quite sure.

Mr. GILLETT. Very well; I shall take the gentleman's word for it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, on Saturday last the beloved Speaker of this House paid a visit to the State of Indiana and spent the day and evening at Fort Wayne, where he was given a most enthusiastic and patriotic reception. And as our State has so much literary talent, so much poetry, so much music, and so forth, I know you will be interested in a poetic welcome to the Speaker by Mr. Frank Carleton Nelson, of Auburn, Ind., as follows:

CHAMP CLARK, FROM OLD MISSOURI.

[By Frank Carleton Nelson, of Auburn.]

Oh, our hearts are filled with gladness and we're feeling proud to-day
Of each and every single State within this U. S. A.;
But beyond the Mississippi, in the grand and golden West,
Lies the State of old Missouri, and it somehow seems the best.

Ah, we love old Indiana, but we love Missouri, too;
No brighter star is shining in the old red, white, and blue;
And within that star so brilliant, a brighter light is seen,
And it shines with wondrous splendor, 'tis the town of Bowling Green.

For from out that little village, as it seems has been God's plan,
When our Nation needs a genius, He has brought from there a man
To do the work we ask of him, a task that must be done;
CHAMP CLARK, that grand old Speaker, Missouri's gifted son.

And is it any wonder that we're feeling mighty proud,
And that everybody's cheering and the bands are playing loud?
Could it ever be expected we could keep our feelings down
When to-day we have the honor of his presence in our town?

Yes; to-day we have him with us, this champion of the hour,
And may the Master grant to him the health and strength and power
To carry on his noble work until the task is done;
May He shower His richest blessings on Missouri's brilliant son.

CONSOLIDATION OF EXECUTIVE BUREAUS.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the bill (S. 3771) authorizing the President to coordinate or consolidate executive bureaus, agencies, and offices, and for other purposes, in the interest of economy and the more efficient concentration of the Government.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota to use some of his time now.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, every one will admit that this is a most extraordinary bill, giving away all the power which is vested in Congress over the organization of the departments, and also giving away all the power over the personnel of the departments which is now vested in the Senate by its power of confirming presidential nominations. The only excuse anyone offers for it is the pressure of war. Everyone admits that in peace time it would be a fundamental abandonment of our principle of democratic government. Under the pressure of war necessity Congress has already passed many bills which have conferred on the Executive powers which in ordinary times would be considered unwarranted and dangerous. I have acquiesced in that legislation. I have been and am eager to confer upon the Executive every power and all the money which I think will aid to muster our resources in this terrible struggle. And now, when this request for new powers is made, the easiest way is still to grant whatever is asked, without much scrutiny, on the theory that it may be useful, that it will at any rate centralize responsibility, and that one could always plead in excuse the unforeseen and impenetrable exigencies of war. That is probably the view that the instinctive and impulsive public opinion of the country would adopt without much consideration of the principle involved.

I appreciate the predicament of gentlemen upon the Democratic side of the House, where this seems to be made a sort of test of party loyalty, and I appreciate the embarrassment on the Republican side of the House, where we all want to be sure that we are not partisan and not refusing any powers that will help on the war. I have considered deeply what my duty is. I have tried to put aside all feeling of partisanship and to judge exactly as if it were an administration of my own party, and considering it thus, with at any rate an honest attempt to be judicial and nonpartisan, I can not bring myself to vote for this measure. I believe until now I have voted, and generally with hearty accord, for all the measures which the administration has asked. And I use that phrase advisedly, because I think all Members in this House will agree that not only since the commencement of the war, but since the commencement of this administration, there has been a constantly growing and, as I believe, harmful tendency that measures of legislation should originate not in Congress but in the executive departments. I remember not many years ago, under a Republican President, how a distinguished Democrat in Congress censured a committee because it admitted that the bill which it presented had been suggested and framed in one of the departments. That, he said, was an improper interference by the executive with the legislative branch and an abandonment by Congress of its duty of initiative. How strange such a criticism sounds to-day! This extraordinary and unprecedented legislation was taken up by the Judiciary Committee of this House the day after it was referred to the committee, was rushed through, as the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] recently told us, in an hour and 20 minutes, and reported without a single amendment. That suggests a complacent yielding to the pressure of the Executive rather than the deliberate judicial examination which we expect from that committee.

This bill differs from all others which have been sent to us not only in its provisions but in the arguments supporting it. In all other cases we have been given some information as to what the bill was intended to effect and why it was necessary. Just what is intended to be accomplished by this bill? Can anyone say? Is anyone authorized to tell us? Certainly no one has told us yet a single specific change it was intended to authorize. In the Senate Committee on the Judiciary, when it was suggested that the Executive should be asked to state what inconveniences would be remedied by the bill, the friends of the President voted down the proposition and demanded that plenary powers to change existing organizations should be granted before any evidence was offered of what changes were desired. That is a novel method of legislation. We have granted every specific power and every appropriation which has been asked, and now a general blanket power is asked to wipe away all the legal boundaries of Executive action and no evidence of its necessity and of its probable result is tendered. And so we are obliged to guess what is its compelling motive. We can doubtless each of us suggest changes in administrative methods which we think would be advantageous, but whether a majority of us would agree on all of them is very doubtful. Moreover, many of them can now be made by the Executive without any legislation at all; others would be at once enacted into law by Congress as soon as recommended; but unless some actual reason is given for a change, or some reason is given why a reason should not be given, I can not make myself a mere unreasoning registering machine to indorse a request which on its face is unprecedented and revolutionary.

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] yesterday assured the House that the President told him it was not intended to affect the Interstate Commerce Commission. We were told what it was not intended to affect, but not one word has been cited of what it is intended to affect. It seems to me that instead of generalities we are entitled to be given some specific reason why the bill should be enacted.

I think it is unfortunate that this administration has seemed so reluctant to take either Congress or the people into its confidence. Despite that I have continued to support by voice and vote the measures which the administration suggested, yet it has detracted something from the pleasure of my support that I have had to give it so blindly. We ought all to cooperate harmoniously and trustfully for the war; the people are warmly and enthusiastically for every necessary action, no matter what self-denial it costs them, and in return we are entitled to be treated with confidence and to have the truth told us. I do not mean to allow myself to become suspicious or critical. On the contrary, I wish to grant every request the administration forwards to us; but I can not shut my eyes and vote blindly for a revolutionary change in the Executive powers when the purpose of it is not even hinted at.

For months before this bill was introduced I had thought there were changes which should be made both in methods of administration and in personnel—and the President had ample power to make them without any new legislation—but few changes were made. Apparently the administration thought, or else wished to lull the people into thinking, that everything was running smoothly; that our war preparations were advancing satisfactorily; and that no changes either of personnel or of administrative methods were necessary. But shortly before the introduction of this bill there came a great shock to public opinion. The disclosures resulting from the investigations of the Senate Military Committee showed that we had been resting in a false security; that there had been terrible delay and inefficiency. These facts had, of course, been well known to the administration, although they had not apparently seemed sufficiently grave to require correction, but they came as an amazing surprise to the people, and there was a popular outcry for some remedy. The remedy suggested by the Senate Military Committee was a minister of munitions and a war council. They, of course, had no right to make or suggest changes of personnel, that being exclusively in the power of the President. The President vehemently opposed the changes suggested by the Senators, and it was then for the first time that this bill was presented, giving him complete authority to change at will all the functions of all the departments, but never up to the present time giving us any inkling as to what changes are desired. A year had passed since the administration began its war preparations, and yet during all that time there had been no apparent criticisms that any vital changes were necessary either in methods or in men. Following the disclosures there have been made a number of changes in personnel, most of which I heartily approve as recognizing the deplorable inefficiency that had existed, and I regret that there have not been many more. I should be glad, too, if the broad powers which the President has to make administrative changes had been exercised. If suggestions had been made to us of changes which needed legislative sanction, I should gladly have given them my support. Anything which would have a tendency to advance efficiency, or which was recommended with that end in view, would be sure of prompt and favorable action here. But the administration, instead of using any of the powers it already has, instead of recommending to us desirable changes, suggests to us as its remedy that we confer upon it blanket power to entirely alter all administrative functions. If I thought that was necessary, I would grant it. But inasmuch as no use at all has been made of the powers which now exist, and no hint is given of the changes desired, I think this request quite an unreasonable method of responding to the public demand for change.

What does this bill accomplish? It gives to the President, and through him to his department heads, the power to abrogate at will all lines of distinction between different branches of administrative work. It enables him, for instance, to take away from the Civil Service Commission, which was intended to exercise a nonpartisan check on appointments to office, all its powers and duties and transfer them to the Postmaster General. He can take away from the Comptroller of the Treasury and from the auditing chiefs, who are supposed to stand as a bulwark against the misuse of appropriations, their powers and confer them upon other officials, so that the same men shall be at once spending the money and auditing their own accounts. Innumerable similar illustrations can be offered; but you will, of course, say that while this gives the power it will not be exercised, and therefore that no harm will be done. I do not charge that in the specific illustrations I have used the power would be exercised, although there have already been indications of a tendency in Presidential action to transfer to the Postmaster General, in his appointments, some of the powers of the Civil Service Commission. You say, "Shall we not trust the President?" But the limitations and the checks which our Constitution and laws have established against Executive usurpation did not originate in suspicion or distrust of any one man, but simply recognized that the history of republics has proved that such limitations are absolutely necessary, particularly in time of war, to preserve democratic institutions. We have already abolished many such restraints in this war. We have certainly proved our confidence. Shall there be no limit to the process? Would you give all legislative powers to the President? Granting that the administration would not, in the illustrations I have used, exercise its power, let me point out to you one specific illustration where the administration asked powers which we, by unanimous vote, thought were improper and refused, and yet which, under this legislation, could now be granted.

The bill which the administration presented for the organization of a War Finance Corporation asked that those powers should be given to a board which the Secretary of the Treasury could appoint at pleasure and could remove at pleasure and could fix the salaries of; in other words, a board of entirely subservient directors, thus really putting the entire power in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury; and that would give to him during the continuance of the war—and perhaps during the next election—practical control over the vast business interests and business development of the country.

Congress did not think it was wise to grant that power. I stated at the time that it was inconceivable to me that any one should ask for himself such power or that any Congress could grant it. Its dangers are too obvious and consist not alone in the unwise exercise of the powers granted, but in the fear and uncertainty and paralyzing apprehension which its mere existence would excite; so instead of giving that power to the Secretary of the Treasury, as was asked, Congress put it in the hands of independent boards whose members must be confirmed by the Senate. The wisdom of that was so palpable and the dangers of the original bill so serious that there was no division here on the question. The Ways and Means Committee was, I understand, unanimous in it. And yet, if this bill should be passed, it allows the provisions which we inserted to be absolutely nullified and allows those enormous powers to be vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, as was originally requested by the administration.

That illustrates one of the dangers, not fanciful or imaginary, but real and substantial. You can not say that the President would not do that, because in doing it he would only be carrying out exactly the program which he asked Congress to effect and which Congress declined, and yet I think every one here will admit that in that difference of opinion Congress was right.

Now, I am not claiming that there are not changes in our administrative system which might well be made. There are processes of red tape—some compelled by act of Congress, others compelled by long departmental usage—which could well be abolished, and Congress, I believe, stands ready and eager to abolish every such cause of delay or inefficiency which is brought to its attention; but we have waited in vain for suggestions of such legislation.

That is one field of legislation where the initiative by a department would not only be natural, but is really indispensable, because it is only those in executive office who become acquainted with the restraints, either of law or custom, and so learn to appreciate the need of change and can suggest to us the difficulty and the remedy. We are not in a position to know what change is desirable until the need is pointed out to us. But I do not believe a single change of that kind has been suggested to Congress which has not been allowed and I do not recall a single suggestion that has been made.

But not only has the Executive failed to recommend to Congress specific improvements which might be accomplished by legislation, but it has failed to utilize the agencies which exist to make such improvements. If there is duplication and lack of coordination in the executive departments, there has been provided a bureau for the very purpose of remedying it and yet which has never been called on for help. There exists, subject to the President's orders, a body of most intelligent workers—the Bureau of Efficiency—which is charged by law with the duty of investigating duplication of work or red tape in the departments, and the President is authorized, upon their report, to himself apply the remedy and abolish the obstacle. As far as I know, the President has made absolutely no use of that agency, but, on the contrary, any suggestions which have been made upon the part of Congress for greater efficiency have not only seemed unwelcome, but have been vigorously condemned.

There was passed in the Senate, under the leadership of the chairman of the Finance Committee, a provision for a joint committee of the House and Senate to economize in expenditures, but when that proposition came up in the House it was met by a letter from the President expressing the strongest antagonism to the proposition. I should have thought the President would be glad to have the cooperation of Congress in times of such extraordinary expenditure in endeavoring to accomplish economy. I doubt if it gave any powers which were not already distributed among different committees of Congress, but by concentrating them in one joint and conspicuous committee of the two Houses it seemed to insure some activity and usefulness, but to that the President expressed himself unalterably opposed.

Then there was reported from the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate, a Democratic committee of course, a bill providing for a minister of munitions. The obvious purpose of that was an attempt to remedy the frightful confusion and delay which all who had any familiarity with the War Department knew existed there. But that congressional suggestion again called forth vigorous opposition from the White House. There could have been nothing partisan in these suggestions, because they were made under Democratic leadership and in Democratic bodies, but they voiced, I believe, a general desire on the part of Congress for a change of administrative methods and dissatisfaction with existing conditions. Such criticism and dissatisfaction obviously excited Executive antagonism, and the smoldering discontent which finally found its outlet in the speech of Senator CHAMBERLAIN, although obviously most unwelcome at the White House, seems at last to have forced the recognition there that there was need of change in executive methods. Up to that time, as far as I know, there had been no admission by the administration, either by word or by act, that all the war preparations were not running smoothly or that any new powers were needed. The country was given to understand that our departments were all functioning admirably, and just as two years before anyone who argued that our country was unprepared for the future was called nervous and unreasonable, so anyone was worthy of the same epithets who early in the winter suggested that on war prepartions were not adequate. But the investigations of the Military Committee of the Senate and the disclosures which they made, if they accomplished nothing else, seem at least to have awakened the administration to the need of changes. The suggestions which Congress made were, to be sure, denounced and condemned, but instead of accepting those suggestions and instead of making any definite countersuggestions, this bill was suddenly presented as a panacea which the administration recommended for existing conditions.

I am glad to say that while this very vague and mysterious bill was the only legislative change suggested, that on the heels of the disclosures which were made changes quickly followed in some of the departments; for we must not forget that, while the President has not, without this bill, the power of diverting all the functions of one department to another, yet he has almost absolute power over personnel. While up to the report of the Military Committee of the Senate the administration had seemed to think that no changes were necessary, and that all the wheels of Government were turning smoothly and rapidly under proper supervision, yet after those disclosures many changes have been made.

Mr. Stettinius was given a position of great importance, which was supposed to correspond somewhat to the minister of munitions recommended by the Senate committee. And now, at last, Mr. Schwab has been given a free hand in the Shipping Board, and another man of prized executive power, Mr. Ryan, has been put at the head of aircraft production. Secretary Baker was given a long vacation. I believe these changes have greatly added to the efficiency of the departments, although I believe that there are many other changes of personnel, both in those and in other departments, which would be equally advantageous.

As far as I can learn, although this bill emanated from the President, not the slightest indication has been given, except the bill itself, of any particular changes which were desired to be made. It is a radical departure from the customary methods of legislation for Congress to pass a bill conferring prodigious and unprecedented powers without the slightest inkling of how those powers were to be used.

The argument will be made, and has been made, "Do you not trust the President? Are you afraid to trust him?" If I have not shown that I am willing to trust the President and if this Congress has not shown its willingness to trust the President by the ungrudging legislation which we have already granted since this war began, then I do not think any evidence could prove our trustfulness—that we are willing to trust him. But, Mr. Speaker, willingness to trust the President is not the issue here. The question is, Shall Congress, with the powers and duties imposed upon it by the Constitution, delegate them to the President? "Trust the President?" It does not mean that you approve everything that the President suggests. If it does, Congress might just as well abdicate and go away, and say that we are simply a registering machine for the President, and that whatever he requests we will enact. We should use our judgment. We are put here with rights and duties to perform, and one of them is to decide whether we will give up our functions or whether we will exercise them.

This asks us to give them up. But the issue has arisen before. It came up at the very beginning of this war. The administration asked us, you will remember, in the first military appropriation bill, to make an appropriation of $3,000,000,000 in a lump sum, and we argued the question out, and Congress said that it was one of the duties of Congress to pass upon detailed estimates, and by an overwhelming vote this House decided not to do what the administration requested, but to continue its power and exercise this scrutiny. Was that any distrust of the President? Not at all. And I noticed in this morning's paper that our action is vindicated, because, it seems, the War Department has made a little mistake of $4,000,000,000 in its estimates this year, and except for the scrutiny of Congress, apparently, that little mistake of $4,000,000,000 would have gone unchallenged. But I simply refer to that as an illustration that Congress does not show any lack of confidence in the President because it differs sometimes from his recommendations. In my opinion we are here not simply to be rubber stamps, not simply always to grant whatever is asked of us, but we are here to deliberate and use our judgment. And one of the duties imposed upon us by law is to make necessary changes in the organization of the departments. That is our duty, and for one, no matter what administration is in power, I can not bring my mind, when no specific information is offered as to what changes are to be made, to abdicate my function and surrender my judgment blindly to the wishes of the administration. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, duties beyond my capacity prevented any hope of my coming with a prepared speech to the House. But there are certain phases of this bill which made it seem proper that I should very briefly speak to you.

With very much of what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has said I am in sympathy. If time were not the most important thing in all of these war matters, I do not know but that I should concur with most of it. But realizing that time is the most important element, I believe we must deal with the practical situation rather than with a theory of government.

I have no fear of Congress losing its power. In point of fact, in my judgment, the time is very near at hand when Congress will use more of its power than in the years that have gone by. But the great essential of its power is not in any sense impaired by this bill. The power of a legislative body has always been in control of the administrative officers or agencies through the purse, and we retain all of the power we have had of controlling the purse strings of the Nation, and by controlling them we can make ineffectual to-morrow the exercise of any power by any administrative officer.

Now, the gentleman complains that we are not told what changes are to be made. If we could be told of what changes are to be made, this bill ought not to be passed. This bill is to be passed because of the practical inability of anybody to now forecast and arrange the changes that ought to take place, not in power, because this bill does not affect that, but in the agencies through whom that power shall be exercised. Nobody knows better than the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], because nobody has had a better opportunity of knowing of the many, many archaic things that exist in connection with our administrative agencies. No one could have sat, as he and I have for months, hearing the various departments report the details of their estimates, without realizing that there ought to be immediate radical reorganization of those departments. Now, for Congress to undertake to do that by legislative enactment would be to begin a work that would require so much time as to make its doing useless, in so far as this war is concerned.

I do not ask men to vote for this bill because they trust the President. I do not believe that any man should make an appeal simply on such a personal ground, though warranted, as it might be, in this instance. I ask it because it is within the common knowledge of every man that in time of war decision and action are the two most vital virtues in connection with any government, and because, whether you like it or not, you are compelled by the force of circumstances to have a war conducted by the administrative end of the Government. It can not be administered by the legislative.

That does not mean we have not any functions to perform. We ought to scrutinize the requests for moneys, and through that scrutiny ascertain how they are being expended, and put checks where checks need be. We have the power, and it is the great power of a legislative body, of summonings and investigating the activities of every officer of the Government. And we have the power of impeachment and of removal wherever the offenses are grave enough to warrant such action being taken.

Those are the great powers that belong to the Congress and that will preserve to it and to the people a true republican form of government. But for it to undertake to pass judgment upon each change that should be made in the organization of the bureaus is to undertake to do a thing that could only be done intelligently by a legislative body after a considerable course of time, and that means that it would have no value in this instance.

The power conferred by the bill is limited to the war. When the war is over a new arrangement of departments and bureaus, of limitations, and of powers will be needed. In that reorganization Congress will have full power, unimpaired by any concession now made. Such a reorganization then by the Congress is inevitable. One of the sure results of the war will be the introduction of modern methods of estimate, taxation, appropriation, and expenditure. But now, in the throes of it, we may not delay many administrative changes necessary until the Congress may deal separately with each. It may be that it is a wide power we confer; there has been nothing so far in the action of the administration that warrants the belief that this power will be used in the extreme ways that have been suggested. Of course, it is conceivable that the President might do many things, and if one wants to take counsel of his fears he can find many reasons why this bill ought not to become a law. But in point of fact men should always bear in mind this fundamental thing that is written into this law: It does not give to the President the right to create any new powers. It does not confer upon him any power that he or his administrative officers as a whole have not now. It simply permits him to rearrange agencies.

Now, are not men really straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel when they have voted, as they have on both sides, powers away beyond anything that is involved here? The very day that we voted for war we gave to the President the power over life and over property, over the destiny of this Nation, so much greater than anything that could flow from the transference of administrative or executive functions from one agency to another that there is no comparison between them. We did it because it had to be done, because the fundamental thing that can not be lost sight of is that war must be run not through a legislative body but through an Executive, and that it will be efficiently run just to the degree that power is centralized.

Now, another thing ought to be said in justice to this administration, and I say it not as a Democrat; I have tried to forget—and my course here, I believe, warrants the statement that I have succeeded in forgetting—any partisanship or party lines since this war began. There have been made great changes and great reforms in the conduct of this war. Every man familiar with the facts knows that to be true, and every man also familiar with the history and the experience of the other great countries in this war knows that they have gone through practically the same evolution that we have. I hold in my hand a report made not later than the 9th day of March by a committee of Parliament upon the ministry of munitions. I could read you here paragraph after paragraph, and, changing only the word "ministry," you would not know but that it was a report touching the activities of similar branches of the Government here at home, showing the troubles that they had, the mistakes that they made and still make. And I speak of that not because we want to rival any other country in the mistakes we made, but in order to impress upon the House the inevitableness of such mistakes when work of this magnitude is undertaken.

The world to-day is such a different world from what it was yesterday that men's minds revolt at the new aspect of things, and they resent what they do not understand. We are no longer dealing as individuals; great units, masses of men, numbered in the millions, are being used as against other units numbered in the millions, and there is a correlation and an interdependence such as was never known before. I submit to you, as practical men, you must put power where it has to be put, upon administrative officers, and only if it is put there can we then hold them properly responsible. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. O'SHAUNESSY] one minute.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I listened to the objections urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] relative to the doing away of the power of the Senate to confirm appointments made by the President, and I fail to see by reading the bill what reference it has to the bill. Is there anything in this bill that does away with the power of the Senate to confirm appointments?

Mr. SHERLEY. No. But what, I take it, was meant by the gentleman from Massachusetts was this, that men have been appointed for certain special duties, and those men have in certain instances been confirmed by the Senate; that if there should be a transference of those duties to other men who have not been so confirmed, the review by the Senate of such appointments would practically have been made of no avail. I think there is something in the gentleman's argument. We are not urging this bill as representing the ideal of government. Gentlemen, we are not dealing simply with ideals of government. We are fighting a great war. That is the thing to be remembered. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I wish I had 30 minutes. I will do the best I can in 10 minutes to hop, skip, and jump, touching here and there a high point or a low depression, as the case may be.

The war power under the Constitution is far-reaching, with or without legislation. Lincoln did not have much of legislation during the war for the Union. As a necessary act to preserve the Union he freed the slaves. It required force, something more than the proclamation. Force was given, and it was approved later on.

So much for that. Ours is a peculiar Government. It does not respond, so far as changes in the Executive are concerned, as readily as do the governments of our allies. Woodrow Wilson kept us out of war, and under that rallying cry, as conditions were at that time, he was reelected President. We are now in war. I am not going to discuss this, that, or the other topic. He is President of the United States, and will be President of the United States until the 4th day of March, 1921; and so far as legislation is concerned, from the negative standpoint, his veto requires two-thirds of this House and two-thirds of the Senate before it can be overridden. In order to pass legislation over his veto a two-thirds vote of the House and a two-thirds vote of the Senate are required. He is Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. I did not vote for him. It is not necessary to say whether we made a mistake in electing him or not. That is behind us. How many times has the Government of Great Britain changed since this war began? Two or three times, has it not? Three or four times in France; twice, I believe, in Italy. Lloyd-George is premier at the head of the British Government; King George, a figure 9 with the tail cut off, is King. The House of Commons is the Government, practically, to sustain the Government, and Lloyd-George is the premier. Asquith, I believe, was turned out. He did not go to the country, because he was patriotic enough and they were patriotic enough to say, "We will resign"; and Lloyd-George was appointed.

Now, I want to say before my 10 minutes is up, for fear I may forget it, that on that side of the House and on this side of the House we realize our condition; and I want to say, further, that the support of both sides of the House, of the legislative body of the House and Senate, has been given to the administration because it was necessary to give it.

Until this war closes and victory crowns the efforts of our people and of our allies, it will continue along that line. We may be anxious about the coming campaign. Our honored Speaker has just made a speech in Indiana, a very good one, I have no doubt, from that standpoint. He is anxious, of course, that you on that side should have a majority in the next Congress and that he should succeed himself. Well, if you have a majority on that side I am anxious that he should succeed himself. But it does not make one particle of difference to the 110,000,000 people in this country and for the progress of this great war whether you have a majority in the next House or whether we have it. [Applause.] So much for that.

I agree with Senator KNOX and Senator MCCUMBER that the President can do substantially everything without the enactment of this bill. First we enacted one law, and then we enacted another law, and another and another, and created commissions galore, and gave him the power, you know, to bring the dollar-a-year people here and to clothe them with power. Too many cooks! I think the President realizes it now. This bill is short but plenary, and I think it codifies the power that the President now has. Of course, the man who is President and a Democrat—it would be the same if he were President and a Republican—has got to have some regard for his party organization and some regard for public sentiment. I say this bill is plenary. Yes, and it is far-reaching. Under our Constitution, under our form of government, in war time the President must have great power. Somebody says, "Oh, well; he will do ridiculous things." That is what they said about Lincoln. They called him a fool, an idiot, and a traitor. God knows what they did not call him. The things they said about him then make modern newspaper abuse seem almost respectable. [Laughter.] The New York Herald, the World, the Times, the Chicago Times, "Brick" Pomeroy, men on the stump and on platforms, abused him. Well, he went along in the even tenor of his way, keeping his head. You say, "Was he perfect?" Why, no. Is Woodrow Wilson perfect? Why, no. I think the President of the United States keeps his ear pretty close to the ground. I am not going to make the criticism that is made sometimes of people in public life, that they keep their ears so close to the ground that the crickets crawl in. [Laughter.] I am not saying that. I speak respectfully of him. He is a man of great ability and great force, but he watches public sentiment. We all watch public sentiment. It is a government by the people, and therefore we pay a great deal of attention to public sentiment.

Now, some gentlemen here have made a contest about the Interstate Commerce Commission. They do not want that commission abolished. What difference does it make whether it is abolished or not? The President has appointed and the Senate has confirmed, and they remain in office until further legislative action. Of course, the Committee on Interstate Commerce would respond as readily to the request of the President as we respond, sometimes reversing ourselves. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BAER. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman five minutes out of my time.

Mr. CANNON. It is not often that I talk, and there are some few things I want to say. Suppose we have just a little bit more general debate.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON. If I can get through in 10 minutes, I will.

While, in my judgment, the President has the power to do a great many of the things, if not everything, that is granted in this bill, in our present condition I am going to vote for the bill, because I want to put it in black and white. I said the trouble was that we had too many cooks. We had overlapping jurisdiction. Well, we have found that out. We are ready to remedy it. I believe the President is ready to remedy it, and I am perfectly willing to enact this short bill to call the matter to public attention. There are a great many people who do not realize what legislation we have given the President under the war power, and they will be informed when we pass this bill. The Government took over the railroads. Yes; we gave the President that authority early, and it seemed to be necessary to do it. He appointed a Director General of Railroads. The Interstate Commerce Commission fixed rates. The railroads fixed the wage, and it has been increased from time to time. As I understand it, the Interstate Commerce Commission did not fix the wage, but they fixed the freight and passenger rates on the railroads engaged in interstate commerce. Well, from the report of the Lane Commission—I am not sure whether it has been vitalized or not, but if it has not been it will be—the railroad employees when they presented their demands for an increase in their wages wanted an increase amounting to $1,000,000,000. That is stated in the report of this commission. They looked the matter all over and finally recommended an increase of $300,000,000. That is going to be given. It may not please everybody. Now, the Director General of the Railroads, Mr. McAdoo, has the power to call to his aid such help as he desires, and with or without that aid he can increase freight rates and passenger rates up to this $300,000,000. He has got to do that, and perchance more and more as the war progresses and prices change of the products that we consume and as money decreases in its purchasing power. If the war lasts long enough he may have to do it again and again. Whether he is going to do it or not, I do not know. But he will have to raise the railroad rates or else he will have to sell liberty bonds to enable him to make both ends meet, do you not see? My judgment in the premises is to give the President the power to codify the power that is already given. Before we went into this war we on this side of the House criticized the President. But since we declared war on Germany there has not been so much of criticism upon this side. There has been some criticism on that side, but the condition has been very different from what it was up to the time that we declared war on Germany.

Now, I believe this bill ceases to operate six months after peace is declared. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] yesterday thought that this bill did not give the President the power that had been exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission to make freight tariffs. Why, the wayfaring man as he runs may read. There is no question about it. It is in every paragraph of the bill.

I agree with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] but disagree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] as to the power that is given to the President. We have got to have production; we have got to feed ourselves; we have got to feed the allies; we have got to make our own munitions; we have got to assist in making the munitions for the allies. We have got to have ships to transport our surplus to the world, but first to the allies. We have made pretty poor progress, not nearly as good progress as we ought to have made in many respects. We Republicans have found it out, and you Democrats have found it out, and the President has found it out. When he put Ryan at the head of aviation and when he put Schwab in to build ships, both practical men, I think he did well. I do not know what Ryan's politics is; I do not know whether Schwab has any or not, and I do not care. They are big men. It is not politics we want; it is aeroplanes and ships. [Applause.]

I have great respect for the gentleman from Massachusetts. He has been my friend and I have been his friend, personally and politically, during all his service when I have had service. He criticizes the bill in some respects. I am neither grumbling nor criticizing, so far as I am concerned. I say again, I am going to vote for the bill without amendment.

Will the President abuse the authority given him? With our population, with our 110,000,000 people, a free people and on the average the most intelligent people on earth—we have some feeble-minded folks; in your party we have Mr. Creel [laughter]; we have people here who say embarrassing things; we have people in the insane asylum, people in the penitentiary—but we are a great, powerful people, of the Caucasian race, substantially, and we understand, I think, more about government than any similar block of people on earth. [Applause.]

Men may draw on their imagination, men may say what this man will do and what that man will do; we have elections every two years, and every four years the Executive changes. Whatever his name may be who succeeds the present President, whatever the names of the people may be who succeed us, I want to say, with old Peter Cartwright, when the Methodist Church west of the mountain met in Nashville. I heard Cartwright tell this. The people came wearing hunting shirts and they would not let Cartwright preach. Bascom said, "Peter Cartwright will preach in this place to-morrow morning at 6 o'clock." He thought there would not be anybody there to hear him preach, but, Cartwright says, "I jumped up and said, 'Brethren, get up and come before breakfast, and we will have such an outpouring of the spirit of the Lord as this conference has not seen up to this time.'" They all came; Bascom was sitting there at 6 o'clock, and Cartwright says, "He pulled the tail of my 'waumus.'" You may not know what that is; it was made of butternut by the good wives. "He pulled the tail of my 'waumus' and said, 'Be careful, Andrew Jackson is coming down the aisle.'" Cartwright says, "I turned to him and said, 'You say Andrew Jackson is coming down the aisle; if he don't repent and get forgiveness for his sins God Almighty will damn his soul as quick as he would that of a Guinea nigger.'" [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may be given 10 minutes, not to be taken out of the time for general debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that general debate be extended 10 minutes and that time be given to the gentleman from Illinois. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Cartwright said, "I preached, and as the congregation was going out and Bascom pulled the tail of my hunting shirt again and said, 'There is Gen. Jackson coming down the aisle and he will cut off your ears.' He came down the aisle, took me by the hand, shook it heartily, and said, 'That was a great sermon you preached; you are my kind of a man,' and he gave me this gold piece." I think they called it a "joe" then; it was worth about $10. He held it up and said, "I have carried it about my person from that time to this." Gen. Jackson was a great man. Peter Cartwright was a great man, and he ran against Lincoln as Democratic candidate for Congress. He was a Union Democrat.

History will take care of itself. Lincoln never dreamed that he would dwell, as he will dwell, in history. McKinley, Garfield, and Cleveland—all of these people who have been

Presidents—will dwell in history to a greater or less extent. And if there be mistakes honestly made as we journey along in this great struggle the people will be magnanimous. They will say, "We could not get ready in a minute; we had to have experience; we had to have preparation; we were not ready," and there was not any of us, as far as I know, that did not regret our want of readiness, thank God, except Creel; and if I wanted to give any advice to this administration, I would say take Creel by the seat of the breeches and the nape of the neck and throw him into space. [Laughter and applause.]

So much for that. [Laughter.] I believe from week to week and month to month and Congress to Congress while this war lasts the great mass of both parties, the people from the North, the South, the East, and the West, will become more efficient, more patriotic, with greater power, and whatever the cost is, whether we mortgage the future or whether we take the property that is in existence and tax it and tax it and tax it—whatever the future may bring to us, we will win this great struggle. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], a member of the committee.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, as one of the members of the committee having charge of this bill I want to speak very briefly in its support. There is no question but that this bill confers great powers upon the President of the United States. That is why I supported the bill in the committee and am supporting it here. When a people confront a great crisis they require that somebody possess and exercise great power. It does not make any difference whether it be a fire, a shipwreck, or whether it be a great nation fighting for its existence, the demand comes up from all the people that somebody be a leader with the power to lead. I am not afraid to give this power, so long as we retain the means of withdrawing it, but I am afraid not to give that power. We do not imperil our form of government by this temporary conference of power, as some gentlemen profess to believe. We would imperil our form of government if we refused to confer the power which would insure the maximum of efficiency in the conduct of this war. We need the maximum of efficiency to-day, gentlemen. In a crisis an autocracy is more efficient than a democracy undertaking to proceed under the operation of its ordinary governmental machinery. Let us not ignore that fact. That is why so frequently in the past peoples under democratic government confronted with the necessity of exercising their greatest possible strength have gone to the autocratic form of government.

The safety of a democracy therefore confronted by a great crisis like that which now confronts us is not in withholding but in giving great power to its agents upon whom it lays great responsibility. We have not the time to debate. This is the time for action, with the full force of our concentrated national energy.

This war is going to be won by that group of nations which can demonstrate the greatest sustained efficiency. We, the allies, have been wasting our resources in the conduct of this war largely through inefficiency. We have lost the Balkans; we have lost Russia and a considerable territory of France and of Italy through lack of a strong centralized command of our resources. We have reached the point in the conduct of this war when we must recognize the fact that not only are the allies on the western front fighting with their backs to the wall, but, difficult as it is for us to realize it, we, the allies, broadly speaking, have been driven back from intrenchment to intrenchment until we are fighting with our backs to the wall. Belgium, the Balkans, Russia, and parts of Italy and of France we have been driven from. We have reached the point where we have got to get down to business with desperate earnestness. We have reached the point where we must have but one business, and that is to win this war. Since the declaration of war I have not bothered about the principles or theories of government. I have asked myself but one question, and that is, Will that which is proposed probably add to the efficiency of my country in the conduct of this war? Applying that test to this proposed legislation, can any gentleman doubt the fact that this bill, if enacted, will add to the efficiency of the Commander in Chief of the fighting forces of this country in the conduct of this war? It does not matter whether you like to have Mr. Wilson the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy or not. He is, and is to be, until the next election. The only thing left for us to do is to enact that legislation which will put power where responsibility to exercise power rests. We must give to the President of the United States unhampered power to use the full strength of this country in the conduct of the war. That is all there is to the bill. I hope and trust that when the judgment of the House is recorded it will be demonstrated that in this matter, as we have been before, we are united upon the proposition of doing everything possible to add to the efficiency of our country in the conduct of this war. [Applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] made to my mind the ablest defense of this bill that could be made. He was as usual clear and powerful in his argument, and the principal strength of it lay perhaps in the dignity and moderation of his language. Yet even he has not convinced me that it is unwise that this bill should be substantially amended. My complaint against this bill is not so much against its form as it now comes before the House. It is against the bill as it was originally brought to the House, just as my complaint was against its twin sister, the War Finance Corporation bill, the bill commonly known as the McAdoo bill, in the form it was brought here. This bill is very much better than it was at that time, and, as you all remember, this House absolutely cut the McAdoo bill to pieces.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Is not this bill exactly the way it was when it came to this House?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I mean when it came to the Capitol. I am going to refer to that. As the gentleman from Massachusetts suggested, this is one of that class of bills that has been drafted somewhere else than in the Congress, and which we are expected to accept on faith. Drafted probably by a clerk in some executive department, taken to headquarters and O. K.'d as war measures, these bills are brought here by an official messenger, and we are told to do the rest. This bill has run the usual gantlet and appears here considerably disfigured, all to its immense advantage, but it still contains, as I believe, some elements of danger. The best that can be said of it is that it is substantially better than it was when first brought to the Capitol. Like Mercury, the winged messenger of Jove, the Hon. A. S. Burleson, of Texas, Postmaster General, in his hours of comparative ease, but exercising also the functions of purveyor extraordinary of bills and politician in ordinary to the administration, one day a few months ago ascended his chariot and came here bringing this document for introduction in this House. Somewhat to his surprise, I imagine, his usual roseate pathway was blocked. Many distinguished leaders of the majority to whom this bill was offered politely declined to undertake its fatherhood.

There was nothing for it except to proceed then to another body, where the majority has usually been found to be more amenable to the will of the Executive. But even there he encountered some rebellion. A number of the leaders of the majority there declined also to accept sponsorship for this bill, and it was some time before anyone could be found to introduce it. In this wise, Mr. Speaker, this bill comes to this House, not as a House bill, not as the Kitchin bill or the Webb bill or a bill bearing the name of some distinguished leader in this House, but as the Overman bill, and the glory, or whatever it may prove to be, of fathering this bill will go to a Member of another body.

The bill appears here in the guise of a war measure, and, as I have said before, due to substantial amendment in the Senate, it is in a form infinitely preferable to the original draft. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] laid especial stress upon the fact that under this bill no new agencies are created. Under the bill, as it was intended Congress should pass it, special provision was made for the creation of new agencies, agencies of all sorts, and it further provided that whatever was done under this bill should be permanently the law of the land, and could only be changed by affirmative action of Congress.

These two worst features of the so-called Overman bill have been eliminated. While greatly restricted, the authority conferred upon the President is still vast and far-reaching, and in my opinion ought to be further restricted. At the start, gentlemen, I will concede that in so far as the authority conferred upon the President shall be used for war-efficiency purposes nothing but good may come from the passage of this bill, but I maintain that in so far as it may be used for other purposes, even though they be thinly veiled as war purposes, it may do great harm. At best this sort of legislation, this transfer of legislative authority from the body in which it belongs to another department of the Government, is bound, particularly if misused in the slightest degree, to bring serious harm, as is all legislation which tends to the strengthening permanently of one branch of the Government at the expense of another. Our fathers bequeathed to us a form of government the very corner stone of which was the independence each of the other of the executive, the legislature, and the judiciary, and I conceive it to be the duty, the highest duty, of all public men to see to it that a just balance of power between those three branches shall be forever maintained. The encroachment of one department over another is a danger not lightly to be considered, and may bring disaster and ruin to our Government. It is true, of course, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] well said, that in time of war the President must have extraordinary powers as Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, and so flexible has our form of government proved to be that to-day the President of the United States has more individual power than any sovereign in the world unless, perhaps, it be the Kaiser. Is it then wise to confer further powers upon the Executive which are not necessarily war powers merely because he asks it? Is it wise to confer such powers on any human being?

I conceive that there rests upon us as national legislators a higher duty than mere blind acquiescence in every demand or request that the Executive may see fit to make. If we must pass without debate or real consideration or amendment every bill that is sent to us from the other end of the Avenue, then it seems to me that our legislative functions will become a mere nullity. We have not and will not deny to the President all the money and all the power necessary to the more effective conduct of the war wherever that necessity may be made apparent; but is the passage of this measure as it stands necessary or even conducive to a more efficient conduct of the war? If it is, it ought to be passed; if not, it ought to be amended. First of all, assuming that the powers to be conferred are to be exercised in every case only for the good of the Nation, is this bill necessary to bring about that result? To my mind it is not. The powers provided are all legislative. They should all be exercised by the Congress, and would be if we were called upon. If the President should send to the Congress a definite program looking to a more efficient reorganization and coordination of the departments and agencies engaged in war processes, the necessary legislation would be passed without a dissenting vote, certainly upon this side of the House. We all recognize that drastic changes ought to be made, particularly in the personnel and organization of the War Department, from the top down. [Applause.] The necessity for such changes is specifically recognized in section 3 of this bill, which incorporates an amendment originally proposed by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], which creates an agency which is to have exclusive control over aircraft equipment and production, the necessity for which is, unhappily, peculiarly apparent at this particular time. Has the Executive in mind an extension of this program to cover other war agencies? If so, why not submit them to the Congress? They would go through without a hitch. If, on the contrary, the President has no such program in mind, then of what use for purposes of war is the passage of this bill now? There is one other alternative, and one I think that we can not afford to overlook. Has the President in mind a program of reorganization and coordination which he is confident would not be approved by Congress? I do not even suggest that he has; but if it were true, what then? Shall we give to him the power to do in one way that which we have specifically denied him the power to do in another? You may say, "We must trust the President." We do trust the President. We have been trusting him with the exercise of higher and more sovereign powers than those possessed, perhaps, by any other chief. Is it unreasonable to ask in return that the President should trust the Congress? We say to the Chief Executive: "Mr. President, we in Congress have forgotten party lines. We have backed you in every measure you have urged for the efficient conduct of the war, and will continue to back you to the limit. We realize that as Commander in Chief you are handicapped by red tape and incompetency in some of the departments engaged in the conduct of this war. If you have a program which will abolish this red tape and divided responsibility and get rid of incompetency and chaos and inefficiency, submit it to us and we will gladly give you the necessary legislation." Is there anything unfair in that?

On the other hand, is it altogether fair to be met with the reply, "I decline to lay my program before you. I am not inclined to trust you to give me what I ask. You must trust me to do what I please." Even if this were a fair rejoinder, is it not absurd to assume that we would refuse to give to the President the power to do that which we have strenuously advocated from the beginning, to wit, to get rid of the incompetents and incompetency which have seriously handicapped us in the conduct of the war? Surely it can not be because we made these suggestions originally that we are not to be permitted to crystallize them into legislative action, but are asked to transfer the power to do so to another branch of the Government. That would indicate a smallness of mind which I hate to believe is possessed by any high official of this administration. Reduced to its final analysis, the issue presented by the Overman bill comes down to this:

In so far as it is a genuine war measure and designed to bring about improved war efficiency, it is unnecessary. So that the only practical uses to which it could be put would be in effecting reorganizations and coordinations not directly affecting the conduct of the war or in the doing of certain things which it was expected Congress would refuse to sanction. If it is intended that the powers granted by this bill should be prostituted to such uses, then it ought to be voted down. If not, this House by judicious amendment ought to make such misuse of them impossible. I am going to cite only one instance of what could be done under this bill which would absolutely undo the deliberate act of Congress.

Either by accident or design, this bill and the McAdoo bill were brought to this Capitol at about the same time. As the gentleman from Massachusetts explained, and as you all remember, the McAdoo bill proposed to confer upon the Secretary of the Treasury, because the board associated with him was purely a dummy board, the sole power to extend to banks and individuals credit to the extent of $4,500,000,000, and, furthermore, he had the power to grant or refuse permission to any corporation or individual in this country to issue securities in an amount of over $100,000. We cut that bill to pieces, and we did it deliberately, and we did it without partisanship. We separated the two great functions of loaning money and of supervising the issue of securities into two different committees. We took away from the Secretary of the Treasury the power to name either of those committees or to veto any of their actions. This House on both sides unanimously decided that such a grant of power, a power never given to any czar in the world, ought not, in a democratic republic, to be given to one man or set of men. And yet, if we pass this bill as it stands to-day, the President by one stroke of his pen could undo the work that Congress did painstakingly and deliberately and restore that proposition practically to its original form. In other words, we will be voting, if this bill is not amended, to permit the Executive to do just that which Congress has deliberately, unanimously, without partisan division, decided ought not to be done. You say that probably nothing of this kind will be done. You admit that it ought not to be done. Why not so amend this bill that it can not be done? I propose to offer such an amendment if no member of the Judiciary Committee does, and I sincerely trust it will pass. If this is a war measure in name, let us make it a war measure in fact. That is all we ought to do. It is all we ought to be asked to do. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to recognize the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] for five minutes.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped this bill could pass the House without any opposition. Some gentlemen seem to think that it will work a great injury in this country unless it is amended. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], who just preceded me, has delivered himself of his objections to this measure, and says that he shall certainly offer certain amendments. What good could his amendments accomplish? Here is a bill that was debated at the other end of this Capitol for days and days. Gentlemen who entertain the views that the gentleman from Ohio entertains delivered themselves there, and after all the talk the bill passed the Senate by an overwhelming majority, just like it is going to pass this House. And it ought to have done it. We realize that we must put all the agencies of this Government in a coordinated form in order for this war to be successfully prosecuted. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] admits that ought to be done, and yet he finds serious fault with this act, which will carry out the very things that he says ought to be done. If he objects to it because he is not the father of it, or because no man in this branch of the Congress saw fit to father it, is that sufficient reason for him here to further object?

I saw as I came up to the Capitol this morning a young man, a soldier from the trenches, who came from the district of our friend BARNHART, of Indiana, a ruddy-complexioned, stalwart young fellow, with his good right arm gone because of a German bomb. And yet we hear men on this floor and at the other end of this Capitol begging questions on the very measures that we know are necessary to put all the activities of this Government into full and complete and harmonious operation under the leadership of the great President of this Nation to properly protect those boys who are in the trenches and the millions that we are yet to send there.

It seems to me, gentlemen of this House, that the boys who are on the battle line offering their lives to their country should have the solid support of every man on the floor of this House, and the way to give it to them is to give the President of the United States full and complete authority to control all of these agencies to properly safeguard the man who proposes to go over the top, by having all the activities of this Government under one head, properly centralized, in order to prosecute the war in a businesslike manner.

The gentleman talks about autocracy. Who is it objecting to the centralization of power so necessary during the stress of war? You do not hear it back on the farm; you do not hear it in the workshops; you do not hear it on the railroad trains; you hear it nowhere except belching out of the mouth of some demagogue or some selfish politician. That is the only place you hear it. It is because you want to make political capital that you will talk against these essential measures that we and all sensible men know ought to be enacted into law. Is it possible that people in a high place, in either branch of this Congress, suggest we are giving too much authority to the President fearing that we will create an autocracy? I ask the gentleman from Ohio if he believes that we can win this war by some quilting society or some young ladies' crocheting society? You must have a complete organization of all these forces in this country to carry this war to a successful conclusion, because we are against the most powerfully organized enemy the world ever saw.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield for a short question?

Mr. QUIN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to know how the gentleman thinks it would help this boy who was wounded in the trenches if under this bill the functions of the War Finance Corporation were transferred to the Capital Securities Committee? That is all I am objecting to.

Mr. QUIN. You have spoken against the blanket power given the President in this bill. Do you object to the President of the United States having the power to take that bureau or any other branch of this Government and put it under the control of fewer men, and do away with a lot of senseless, nonsensical red tape, and a lot of useless clerks who are parasites instead of a help to carry on this war? [Applause.] That seems to be all there is to that particular change. I am for this bill without any amendment. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. QUIN. Could the gentleman give me a little more time?

Mr. WEBB. I am sorry I have no more time. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that, to whatever extent we have failed to realize our reasonable expectations in the preparation for and the conduct of the war, that failure has not been due to any appreciable extent to any lack of authority in the President of the United States to create or coordinate agencies, or to make provision, by appointment or otherwise, for all the proper and necessary organizations for the prosecution of this great enterprise. Holding that opinion, I know of no particularly sound and compelling reason for the passage of this legislation authorizing the President to consolidate or coordinate bureaus or transfer duties or functions other than the fact that the legislation is here, that it has been suggested and proposed, that it has passed one of the two branches of Congress, and that it is now before the House of Representatives for consideration. Without regard to the question as to the necessity of the legislation in order to so arm the President as to enable him successfully to marshal our resources, the very fact that the legislation has been proposed, that it has progressed thus far in its legislative journey, and that we are called to pass upon it, in my opinion makes it our duty to vote for it and to do our part in crystallizing it into legislation. If we fail to do that, we are likely to create a situation under which the Congress may be held responsible for any and every thing that may go wrong. If we fail to enact the legislation, then every fault or failure in organization and in personnel, every delay, every unwise or unfortunate act or enterprise, is likely to be charged not against those responsible but against the Congress of the United States, and charged in a way that will be likely to convince the American people that the Congress, and not the President and those in administrative authority, are to blame. The President has asked this authority. The Senate has granted it, and, under those circumstances, whatever may be our view and opinion as to the necessity of the additional authority, the fact of the legislative situation makes our duty very clear. The granting of broad and far-reaching authority, such as is proposed in this bill, is always more or less questionable. We realize that such broad authority may be abused; it may be unwisely administered. Yet there may be situations in which the additional authority granted to the President may enable him so to unify and coordinate and adjust administrative agencies as to be of real value in the prosecution of the war. The responsibility of granting appropriations, of making provision for men and material, rests with Congress; the responsibility for the outcome must rest with the administration. We may doubt the wisdom or the necessity of this particular grant of power, but the grant has been requested by those in position of responsibility as important and necessary. In that view of the matter we must assume that the administration will wisely use, utilize, and administer the additional authority asked and about to be granted. We must at least hope that it will be so used and administered as to bring about a better condition and a much-needed improvement in the administrative departments of the Government, and in that way aid in the successful prosecution of the war. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that this legislation is at all necessary, still I am going to support it. It seems clear that with the power in the President to abolish all bureaus and other governmental agencies where duplication of work occurs, coordination can readily take place. But that is not the chief reason why this legislation is not necessary. The President may now appoint anybody he sees fit to conduct this war, and can dismiss anybody in power if he finds anyone who is inefficient. He has the money, the men, and the power to build the necessary war machine. I can not go as far as Senator KNOX is said to have gone in arguing that this bill confers no additional powers. I think it does, but I do not believe the powers conferred are at all essential to the conduct of the war. I think it is even doubtful whether the power we are attempting to confer is strictly constitutional. I am aware that there are decisions that support the view that it is. There are other decisions that indicate that this is not constitutional. There are the two lines of cases. I am not going to discuss them; I have not the time to go into any question of that kind. As I view it, support can be found for this sort of legislation. The view I entertain in reference to the merits of this bill is this: We are at war. Every nation that has been at war has found it necessary to concentrate power. We must concentrate power. I am not willing to deny to the administration the power it deems to be necessary at this time. Let us give to the President the power he asks, and hold him responsible for its exercise. I can not see that this is going to do any harm. It does not confer any new powers upon any of the departments. It simply allows the President to redistribute existing powers, coordinate them, to make them more effective. This might be a very good bill to pass in peace times. I do not believe we shall ever reorganize this Government unless it can be done under power such as this. We have tried to do it through commissions or like agencies appointed to study the situation, and frame a plan for that purpose; but we have always failed to accomplish it in the past, and I am glad of the opportunity to turn over to the administration this power. Under the pressure of present necessity we may get some sort of a reorganization that will be of advantage to the country. I am going to offer some amendments to the bill. I am not going to offer any that will change the purpose of it. I think the first two sections should be consolidated into one. These sections define the power given to the President. My amendment does not change the powers, simply embodies the same language in more logical form. I know it is urged that we must not touch this bill, that it is sacred. It was not considered sacred in the Senate. They adopted a number of amendments to it.

Why should we not correct the bill and put it in some logical form and pass it? It can be passed at the other end of the Capitol in the course of a few minutes. I am in favor of one or two other amendments seeking to perfect it and carry out the purposes of this bill, amendments that will strengthen rather than weaken it. I believe the President ought to have the power provided for in this bill, and I am going to vote for it under the circumstances. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy only a few minutes of the remaining time I have in discussing briefly the objections made to the bill on the ground that it may include power in the President to transfer the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission to some other unknown person, to Mr. McAdoo, or to somebody else. In other words, they do not want the President to have the power to make rates. I imagine that is the chief objection. They certainly could not argue that if he will transfer such powers he will transfer it to some incompetent person or to some dishonest person. The only reason why any man in this House can assume that he would transfer such functions would be because the Interstate Commerce Commission would fail to raise the rates to a sufficient height to get money enough to pay the running expenses of the railroads under Government control.

Mr. Speaker, this House has already voted to give the President the power to fix rates outright. If the President should in the course of this war do what I insist he has no idea of doing—that is, transfer the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission to some individual or to some other power—the only object of it would be to get money to help pay the Government's debts. If he were to transfer these functions, it would be to some agency that would be able to agree to his idea of what the rates should be.

Now, is that novel for this House? The truth of it is that this House voted by an overwhelming majority to give the President and the President alone the power to initiate and fix railroad rates during the period of Government control. Now, why should we be balking at this time when we agreed a few months ago that the President should have the power to fix rates? Why should we be balking at the proposition that he might possibly at some dim and distant future time during the war transfer the power to some agency that the President might control in fixing railroad rates during Government ownership or operation?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. The power that the gentleman is now referring to in the act was preserved, some right of the Interstate Commerce Commission was preserved in it with reference to rate fixing, was it not?

Mr. WEBB. It is now as provided by the conferees, I want to say to my friend, and that is what I am coming to. In the Committee of the Whole the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] offered an amendment which preserved to the Interstate Commerce Commission its present powers, under the acts of 1887, to fix and control railroad rates during the Government control. The Committee of the Whole adopted it. When it came into the House and a separate vote was demanded, that amendment was beaten by a vote of 210 to 165. In other words, this House voted against retaining in the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to fix rates and declared itself in favor of leaving it to the President absolutely to fix rates. And I noticed among the distinguished Republicans who voted in favor of giving the President the power to fix rates, and therefore against the Sweet amendment, was my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who was consistent here to-day and did not fear the President's power to make rates then, and he does not fear his power to make them now. But the President told me that he has no intention of attempting to fix rates, except as provided in the railroad bill. He signed the bill giving the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to review his initiated rates. He says, "I signed that, and I knew what I was doing when I signed it." But not only were there 45 or 50 Republicans who voted in favor of giving the President the power to fix rates, but in the bill as passed by the House, instead of the Sweet amendment, was this language:

> But when in the judgment of the President it is necessary in the public interest he may initiate rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices, or changes therein by filing the same with the Interstate Commerce Commission in such form and at such time and upon such notice as he shall direct. All rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, and practices, or changes therein so ordered, shall be fair, reasonable, and just; and the Interstate Commerce Commission shall upon complaint make investigation and grant full hearings concerning the fairness, justice, and reasonableness of any rates, fares, charges, classifications, regulations, or practices, or changes therein so ordered by the President; and shall make report of its findings and recommendations concerning the same (which findings and recommendations shall prima facie be taken as correct) to the President for such action as the President may deem required in the public interest.

In other words, when the railroad bill passed this House gave the President the power to fix rates, and in the Senate it was changed so as to give the President the power to initiate and the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to revise. Now, why should we be so fearful that some time in the future the President may undertake to make rates for the railroads that the Government owns?

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman contend that the Government owns the railroads?

Mr. WEBB. "Controls," I meant.

Mr. MADDEN. No; the gentleman said "owns."

Mr. WEBB. I know it does not own them. It controls them. We must pay the rental value of the railroads. We must pay dividends on their bonds. For all intents and purposes we own them during the war, and we must pay the expenses of operating them. Suppose we ran $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 behind. Is it fair to allow the Interstate Commerce Commission, or the President, if you please, to fix the rates high enough to pay off that debt or deficit? Or will you ask Congress to give permission to sell more liberty bonds to pay it or raise the deficit by taxation?

Mr. WALSH. What is the occasion for raising the rate?

Mr. WEBB. I do not know that there is any. I am simply arguing the bare possibility which gentlemen have suggested in this debate.

Mr. WALSH. Will it do it unless it is necessary? The gentleman knows that there have been readjustments in reference to railroads which will necessarily demand an increase of rates.

Mr. WEBB. That may be so. If the Government needs two or three hundred million dollars for railroads, suppose the Director General goes to the Interstate Commerce Commission and says we need three hundred million dollars; had Congress rather the railroads would raise the rates upon the command of the Interstate Commerce Commission or had you rather go to Congress and get authority to sell liberty bonds to make up the deficit?

Mr. WALSH. Does not the gentleman think that the Interstate Commerce Commission is just as competent to pass upon the raise of rates when the Government controls the railroads as it would be in private ownership?

Mr. WEBB. I do, and so does the President. The President signed the railroad-rate bill knowing he was given by Congress the power only to initiate rates, and you and I know that the House gave him the power not only to initiate but to make railroad rates. Now, some Members of the House get alarmed because they fear we are giving him power over the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] criticizes and complains that some of these bills during the war time have come from the departments. I would like to ask him who is more competent to frame a bill, a war emergency bill, than those who see the necessity for them? So far as I know no bill has been presented to either branch of Congress but what has been amended liberally, promptly, and fearlessly by both branches of this Congress. My friend complains of undue haste in the consideration of this bill. The newspapers of the country have been full of it for eight weeks. It was discussed in the Senate for about six weeks, and I think almost every Member of the Senate made a speech on it. When it came over here the House had pretty well made up its mind how it was going to vote. I think it passed the Senate on the 4th of May, and on the 7th or 8th of May the Committee on the Judiciary, without an objection on the part of any member of the committee, considered it, and they, like the House and the country, had made up their minds about it. After about an hour and a half of debate the committee reported it favorably. It has been on the calendar for a week, and the House has had time to read the bill and make up its mind.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. COX. Was the report on this bill a unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. COX. No member of the committee made a minority report?

Mr. WEBB. No. I do not want to give away any secrets of the committee, but not more than one voted against it.

Mr. COX. But there was no minority report?

Mr. WEBB. No; and I am glad that the gentleman did not file a minority report. There is no reason why the House in its anxiety to adjourn some time during July or the 1st of August should take up the time in drifting along on this bill when the Members had made up their minds how they were going to vote on it.

My friend from Massachusetts urges another criticism of the measure that there is no detailed plan, no detailed outline, as to the various functions and branches of departments that the President wants to change and unite. No; and there is no living man who can go through these departments to-day inside of a year and give you a general plan to cover the 400,000 Government employees and their functions.
